

DELHI UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

DELHI UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Cl. No. V671:21: B1

D8

Ac. No. 155977

Date of release for loan
18 JUL 1961

This book should be returned on or before the date last stamped below. An overdue charge of Six nP. will be charged for each day the book is kept overtime.

QUEEN HATSHEPSUT.

The Queens of Egypt

BY

JANET R. BUTTLES

WITH A PREFACE BY

PROFESSOR G. MASPERO

LONDON

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & CO. LTD.

10 ORANGE STREET, LEICESTER SQUARE

1908

LONDON :
HARRISON AND SONS, PRINTERS IN ORDINARY TO HIS MAJESTY, ST. MARTIN'S LANE.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

IN the following preface, Professor Maspero has so clearly pointed out the difficulties which present themselves to the compiler of a history of this kind, that further word of explanation seems almost superfluous.

No claim for original research work of any sort is made for this sketch of the Queens of Egypt. The writer's attempt has been rather to collect, in convenient form, as much as was possible of the widely scattered evidence on the subject. So many of the royal women who shared the throne of the Pharaohs have left no traces on the land of their inheritance, that this attempt to tell their story results at best in only a brief outline of the prominent figures, the many gaps which occur in the long line of heiresses being but imperfectly filled here and there by isolated names unaccompanied by signs which indicate family or period. In the cases of many of the best known queens, Egyptologists often disagree in their explanation of evidence, and widely opposed theories result. In this volume the effort has been to choose a middle course between any two great extremes, and generally to give the views of more than one authority on disputed points.

In the Valley of the Nile, every year brings forth fresh discoveries, any one of which may throw new light on some of the many mysteries by which we are confronted in the study of the Ancient Egyptian Sovereigns; and it may well be found easier to write their histories in more detail a few years hence than it is at present.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

I am under deep obligations to Professor Maspero for his preface to this volume, and for his kindness in having read the proofs.

My thanks are also due to Dr. Wiedemann, and to M. Legrain, for notes ; to Mr. Percy E. Newberry, for having read the first part of the book in manuscript, and for placing at my disposal many of his own notes ; to Mr. T. M. Davis, for permission to use the Plates Nos. I and VI, from his publication on the tomb of Hâtshopsîtû ; and to Émile Brugsch Pasha, for courteous assistance in the Cairo Museum, for the use of books, and for his fine photographs, from which, with the exception of Plates I, IV, V, and VI, all the illustrations in this volume are taken.

JANET R. BUTTLES.

Florence,

February, 1908.

PREFACE.

BY

PROFESSOR G. MASPERO.

How does it happen that among the literary travellers each year who frequent the Valley of the Nile, no one until to-day has taken enough interest in the Queens of Egypt to undertake the writing of their history? The subject, however, ought to have been attractive, as well for its novelty as for its abundance of material. The Egyptian woman enjoyed far greater personal independence than was usually accorded to the women of the East. She had a large share not only in the government of the family, but also in religious ceremonies, and even in the affairs of the exterior world. The records of the monuments show her to have been as actively concerned in the affairs of her day, war alone excepted, as her father, her husband or her son. The queens, indeed, enjoyed less freedom than did their female subjects, the dignity of their state preventing them from mingling easily in general life; yet freedom, though less claimed, was still theirs by right, and could be indulged in according to the individuality of character or through the trend of circumstances. Owing to her relationship to Mr. Theodore Davis, Miss Buttles has been enabled to trace at her leisure the footsteps of Egyptian Queens in the land in which they lived their lives and which preserves for us their bodies. She has entered many of their Royal tombs, and whether measuring the last earthly couch of Hâtshopsîtû^f, or handling the jewels and funeral furniture of Thy, she felt drawn into something like personal relations with her subject. Other queens seen by her through the glass cases of our Museum, and then but dimly recognised, unveiled their faces to her as she sought in books and amidst the dust of ruins for the story of their lives, while she endeavoured to replace them in their old environment and to connect their withered profiles with the slim silhouettes instinct with youth and grace, which they have left upon the walls of ancient Theban temples.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Her task has not been light. Many of the documents relating to the queens are not yet published, and others are preserved in works which are well-nigh inaccessible to one who is not a professional Egyptologist. Therefore, she has needed much patient perseverance in collecting her material, much discriminating prudence in the use of what she found. Our science advances only at the cost of errors which follow and destroy one another for a long time before vanishing at last before the exact truth. Sometimes a queen whom we ranked at first in a later dynasty, is now considered a member of an earlier; a queen we deemed the mother of some Sovereign, is now known to have been that Sovereign's wife. For over half a century Hâtshopsîtû has wrongly borne the name of Hataï, a name still used by those who prefer its sound. For the construction of such a history, a mere series of extracts from the works of well-known authorities would not suffice. It was necessary to follow the variations and development of their ideas until their latest expression could be gained; these results then had to be submitted to the criticism of other authorities who had touched on the same points, while reference was made wherever possible to the original evidence. This is what Miss Buttles has done to the best of her ability; errors are consequently rare in her book, errors resulting from superficial study or neglect of modern evidence. When she is mistaken, she can generally quote the precedent of some savant who was her authority, and whose error has not yet been corrected.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is, then, an authentic series of the Queens of Egypt which she has established, although it cannot yet be affirmed that the series is complete. Many a wearer of the uraeus and double diadem is missing from the ranks, perhaps will never answer to the roll-call. If the Heracleopolitan and Xoïtan Pharaohs still evade research, small must be our chances of discovering the wives who shared their thrones. Nine out of ten of those spared by oblivion are little more than names, although some seem to stand out more vividly among the shadows; yet they remain but phantoms, while only a phase or two of their past lives is offered to our view. Mutemuau reveals herself for the first time on the night of her supernatural marriage, and remains visible till the birth of her son Amenôthes III.; her maternal task accomplished, she fades again into the darkness and never reappears. Ahhotpu I., daughter, wife, ancestress of kings, owes the greater part of her present fame to the jewels placed upon her mummy by relatives desirous that she should be as richly adorned in the next world as in this. A stela of Abydos transports us to the palace of Nofritati and records for us in detail a conversation with her husband Ahmosis, yet when associated with the cult received by hers on Amenôthes in the necropolis of Thebes, the queen is almost effaced in the goddess. And to make mention of Hâtshopsîtû herself, of whom we possess the most detailed accounts, we are given minute particulars as to her birth and education, her coronation and her buildings, her expedition to the Ladders of Incense ; yet how little do we know of her marriage, or of her relations with her nephew Thoutmôsis III. ?

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Miss Buttles has given us a faithful register of all that we have been permitted to learn upon her subject—names, titles, here and there an isolated episode, occasionally an extended biographical account. The gaps result from the lack of documentary evidence on the persons studied ; no one could do more or better with such fragmentary material.

CONTENTS.

CHAPTER.	PAGE.
AUTHOR'S PREFACE	iii
PREFACE BY PROFESSOR G MASPERO	v
LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS	x
I. QUEENS OF DYNASTIES I-III	1
II. QUEENS OF DYNASTIES IV-XI	12
III. QUEENS OF THE XII TH DYNASTY	27
IV. DYNASTIES XIII-XVI	36
V. QUEENS OF THE XVII TH DYNASTY	44
VI. QUEENS OF THE XVIII TH DYNASTY TO HATSHEPSUT	54
VII. THE DAUGHTER OF THOTMES I.	79
VIII. QUEEN HATSHEPSUT TO QUEEN THIY	96
IX. QUEEN THIY	106
X. FOREIGN WIVES OF AMENHETEP III. AND OTHER QUEENS OF XVIII TH DYNASTY	125
XI. QUEENS OF THE XIX TH DYNASTY	144
XII. QUEENS OF THE XX TH DYNASTY	164
XIII. QUEENS OF THE XXI ST DYNASTY	170
XIV. XXII ND AND XXIII RD DYNASTIES	191
XV. QUEENS OF THE ETHIOPIAN DYNASTY	202
XVI. XXVI TH DYNASTY... ..	215
UNPLACED QUEENS	230
KING LIST	231
QUEEN ^S LIST	235
LIST OF REFERENCE ABBREVIATIONS	238
INDEX	241

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS.

PLATE

- I. Frontispiece. Queen Hatshepsut From Temple of Deir el Bahari. Reproduced from T. M. Davis's Tomb of Hatshepsut.
- II. Princess Nefert. (To face page 13) Limestone statue in Cairo Museum. Photographed by Brugsch.
- III. Queen Aah-hetep I (To face page 47.) Coffin lid in Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch
- IV. An XVIIIth dynasty Princess (To face page 56.) Limestone statue. Florence Arch. Museum. Photo. Brogi.
- V. Queen Aahmes Nefertari. (To face page 59.) Wooden statuette. Louvre Eg. Museum. Photo. Sauvanaud
- VI. Queen Aahmes. (To face page 75.) Temple Deir el Bahari. Reproduced from T. M. Davis's Tomb of Hatshepsut.
- VII. Queen Tiaa. (To face page 100.) Statue Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch
- VIII. Queen Tiaa and Thotmes IV. (To face page 101.) Statue Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch.
- IX. Queen Thy. (To face page 106) Alabaster Canopic jar lid Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch.
- X. Queen Thy (To face page 120.) Small head from Sinai. Cairo Museum Photo. Brugsch.
- XI. Queen Nefertiti and her children. (To face page 131.) From Lepsius Denkmähler. Photo Brugsch.
- XII. Queen Mut-nezemet. (?) (To face page 142.) Colossal head Cairo Museum Photo. Brugsch.
- XIII. Queen Nefertari-meri-en-mut. (To face page 147) From colossus of Ramses II., Temple of Luxor. Photo. Brugsch.
- XIV. Queen Nefertari-meri-en-mut. (To face page 150.) Abu Simbel. From Lepsius Denkmähler. Photo. Brugsch.
- XV. Princess Bant-antha. (To face page 152.) From colossus of Ramses II at Memphis. Photo. Brugsch.
- XVI. Queen Maat-neferu-Ra. (To face page 154.) Abu Simbel. From Lepsius Denkmähler. Photo. Brugsch.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

PLATE

- XVII. "The White Queen." (To face page 156.) Painted limestone bust. Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch.
- XVIII. Queen Makeri. (To face page 178.) Coffin lid in Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch.
- XIX. Queen Astemkheb I (To face page 181.) Coffin lid in Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch.
- XX. Queen Ameneitas. (To face page 206.) Alabaster statue in Cairo Museum. Photo. Brugsch.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT

CHAPTER I.

QUEENS OF DYNASTIES I-III.

THE history of Ancient Egypt is full of surprises for the modern investigator. Its extraordinary culture, the high standard of its arts, the breadth of its philosophies, perfection of its mechanical skill and brilliancy of its conquests, make up the most remarkable and fascinating story in the annals of nations.

Every year the explorer brings to light new evidence of that mysterious world which had its being six thousand years ago in the land of the Nile; flourished for forty centuries and then died, before the dawn of Western civilization.

These records glow with warm human life, are vigorous and keen, naively fresh and simple, like the enthusiasms of youth. Thousands of years have passed since these imprints of a nation were stamped on papyrus, graven on jewels, cut in stone, fixed in towering pyramid and pylon, hewn on the face of mountains, and thrust into the heart of the earth. No people have so impressed themselves on the land of their habitation. The whole country is an open book, in which all who will may read the story of the first sons of Egypt.

Perhaps the most remarkable feature of this Ancient Empire is the very unusual position held in it by the Egyptian woman, a position unique and unparalleled in the history of womankind. Her importance in the State seems to have been recognized as supreme, and many writers on Egyptology hold that woman was the sole heiress; the man inheriting both property and position only through the rights of his wife or mother. This supremacy of the woman made her the legal head of the house, gave her the precedence over all the men of her family, and even carried her to the sovereignty of the State, placing the crown upon her head, and endowing her with the natural rights of government. Professor Petrie says: "It is very doubtful if a king could reign, except as the husband of the heiress of the kingdom, the right to which descended in the female line, like other property."

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Doubtless the law of the land gave theoretically the chief supremacy to women, but it is not possible to read the long lists of kings' names—lists which often cover several generations in time, and yet contain no reference whatever to either queen or heiress—without suspecting that the woman's right to govern was practically a dead letter. The man, perhaps, owed his inheritance to her; nevertheless, his records, with few exceptions, represent himself as the sole executive power, standing quite alone before his people and his gods, pre-eminently the Chief.

It is clear, then, that the woman usually relegated her sovereign rights to her husband, who assumed the government in her stead, and performed all acts of the kingly office in his own name.

From very ancient times the possession of the realm appears to have been claimed as a divine inheritance.

Each Egyptian province had its own god, whose importance waxed or waned according to the fortunes of the province itself. Thus, the great sun-god of Heliopolis, Ra, was forced to give place to Amen, tutelary god of Thebes, when the supremacy of Egypt passed to the Theban princes. In later times, Amen absorbed the name and attributes of the Heliopolitan deity, and became

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Amen-Ra, "King of the Gods," "Lord of the thrones of the World."

From this sun-god, under his varying forms, the kings of Egypt, beginning with the IVth dynasty, claimed a literal descent; and soon added to their other titles that of "Son of Ra."

By the XVIIIth dynasty, this belief in the "divine right of kings" had taken so firm a hold on the Egyptian imagination as to become the fundamental idea on which the succession was based; the holders of the crown claiming descent from a royal line which had as its progenitor Amen-Ra himself.

Sometimes a direct heir of this god-like line was wanting, in which case the father-god did not disdain to purify the "Solar race" on earth, by becoming incarnated in mortal form and creating a new heir to the crown. If a foreigner or person not of the royal house gained possession of the throne, it was probably necessary for him to marry a princess of the "Solar blood," in order to secure the divine right to his children.

Under these circumstances a royal daughter of Ra, whose birthright entitled her to the sovereignty of Egypt, was the most desirable spouse for the king. Marriages with other princely houses were, nevertheless, frequently contracted by the Pharaohs. In such cases, if the king's own descent was entirely pure, the marriage of his son with "Solar" princess would re-establish the succession on its old basis.

In the XVIIIth dynasty, and possibly earlier, the idea of preserving the purity of the "Solar race" seems to have become of supreme importance. Intermarriages with other houses introduced an alien strain into the divine one, and the simplest way to keep the line pure was for the children of Ra to marry one another. Marriages between brothers and sisters, therefore, became the lawful and established custom.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

If the sovereigns were of equal rank, that is, when both were the children of a full brother and sister, it is possible that the man's rights were superior to those of the woman; in other cases he assumed the government by virtue of his wife's right. The sovereign's eldest son was often associated with him in the government, and married to the next heiress while very young.

Belief in the divine descent seems never to have lost its hold on the Egyptian mind. In later times, when the "Solar line" became hopelessly involved by the rapidly changing dynasties of foreign kings and conquerors, a convenient arrangement was made by which a king could take an "official wife" from among the princesses belonging to the so-called "Harem of Amen," and by this nominal connection make good his claims through the supposed rights of the wife.

The records of woman's rule in Egypt begin very early. It is said that her right to be an independent reigning sovereign was legalized by Ba-en-neter,¹ a king of the IInd dynasty of Egyptian monarchs, dating about 4000 B.C. Ba-en-neter had, perhaps, no son to succeed him, and so framed the law which secured the active government to his daughters. No record remains, however, of the independent reign of a woman until a thousand years after its legalization.

The proofs of the importance and regal condition of these queens of old are found throughout Egypt on temple walls and sculptured tombs; on burial stelæ and papyrus records; in the magnificence of their sarcophagi, coffins and jewels; and in the stately worship which followed them into the tomb and placed their spirits by the side of the gods in reverence and devotion.

Throughout the vast records of Egypt's past, there sounds a never-ending echo of high titles recalling a line of princesses who were: "Royal Heiress," "Royal Spouse,"

¹ Manetho-Corvis Fragments, p. 98.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"Divine Mother," "Lady of the North and South," "Great Mistress of the two Lands," "Ruler of all Women," "The Consort of the gods," "The Great Consort of the King." The obscuring mists of time have blotted out the greater number of these queenly personalities, and for the first thousand years of Egyptian history it is only here and there that a solitary name breaks for an instant through the darkness of the ages, and recalls some long-forgotten queen.

The first one of these faint shadows to appear heralding the ghostly line is found on the very border-land of history, that dim period of the past which connects fabled ages with the actual 1st dynasty of Egyptian kings, at a date some time before 4000 B.C.¹

NEITH-HEFET, "Princess of the Saïte Kingdom."

This queen appears to have been the mother of Mena, first historic king of Egypt.

For many years the name of Mena was the first in the annals of Egyptian history. The unknown period which preceded him was speculative and mysterious, filled by Herodotus and Manetho with fabulous dynasties of gods and demigods, or Horshemsu. The recent excavations of MM. de Morgan, Amélineau, Petrie and others have, however, widely extended the horizon of Egyptian history. The period thus brought to light is now known as "predynastic," and it may be that in the kings belonging to this time, we have the actual representatives of the ¹ The reasons for the impossibility of a fixed system of dating for early Egyptian history are clearly stated by BUDGE: Hist. Egypt, vol. I, pp 146-161.

For histories of the Predynastic Period, the position of Women, etc., see MASPERO, Dawn of Civilization, pp. 3-344; PETRIE, Hist. Egypt, vol. I, 1-15; BRUGSCH, Egypt under the Pharaohs, 1-18; BUDGE, Hist. Egypt, vol. I; PETRIE, Nagada and Ballas; WIEDEMANN, de MORGAN, JÉQUIER, FOUQUET, Les Origines de l'Égypte, "Tombeau Royale de Nagada"; DE MORGAN, Ethnographie Préhistorique; AMÉLINEAU, Les Nouvelles Fouilles d'Abydos mysterious Horshemsu, or followers of the god Horus, mentioned by Manetho.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Last of the predynastic monarchs was Narmar, a king of Upper Egypt, who was probably the father of Mena. Neith-Hetep was a daughter of the king of Lower Egypt. Her title defines her as a princess of the Saite Kingdom, the chief deity of which was the goddess Neith. She had also the title of the "Consort," and was presumably the wife of Narmar. By this alliance the red and white crowns of the two countries were joined, and Mena, the son of Narmar and Neith-Hetep, inherited the double diadem which gave to his sovereignty the whole united kingdom.¹

In a large tomb of twenty-one chambers found at Negada, by M. de Morgan, were several small bits of ivory which had been the labels attached to necklaces of the Queen Neith-Hetep. The necklaces had disappeared, but the ivory slips remained to tell of the number of stones composing the ornaments and to place their ownership.

One of the sealings also found in this tomb may admit of the reading "Ba-Neith-Hetep," that is, "The spirit of the Neith-Hetep."² The tomb was at first supposed to belong to a king whose name was read Āhā; later, Herr Borchardt showed that Āhā was not another king, but the "Horus-name" of Mena.

Mr. Petrie argues that the burial place of Mena was in the royal cemetery of Abydos, and that the great tomb at Negada in which Neith-Hetep's necklace labels were found was that of the Queen.³

It must have been during the age in which Neith-Hetep lived that the Egyptian Empire was founded. The energies of her husband and son were concerned with those mighty enterprises which, according to Manetho and Herodotus, deflected the course of the Nile, reared great

¹ NEWBERRY and GARSTANG, Hist. Egypt, 33, 34.

² See de MORGAN, Recherches, II, fig. 559.

³ PETRIE, Royal Tombs, vol. IV, 4.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Memphis on its banks, and established a religion. All the records of this age show evidence of a high state of civilization. The king "taught his people the adoration of the gods and the manners of divine worship; how to adorn their beds and tables with rich cloths and coverings, and was the first that brought in a delicate and sumptuous way of living."¹

A time which left such legends as these to succeeding generations must have been one of luxury and splendour; and it is reasonable to suppose that this long-forgotten queen in an almost mythical past held her court in the same regal state as that recorded of the later Queen-consorts and mothers of the Pharaohs. Neith-Hetep does not appear to be the only queen of that far-away Ist dynasty who has left a trace upon the annals of the period. It is possible that she had a contemporary in SHESH,  whose exact chronological position is doubtful. This queen is known only as the mother of a king Teta, possibly the same Teta who was son and successor of Mena. Manetho states that Teta was a physician and wrote certain essays on medicine; and Queen Shesh seems to owe the immortalizing of her name to nothing more important than the receipt for pomatum to make the hair grow. The Ebers Medical Papyrus states that such a pomatum was made for the mother of King Teta, presumably under the direction of her physician son. The ingredients of this lotion of six thousand years ago were, "the claw of a dog and the hoof of an ass, with some dates, boiled together in oil."²

If Teta was actually the son of Mena, then it is possible that his mother Shesh was the queen-consort of that king; but until some further evidence regarding her state is forthcoming from out the vast slowly-opening store-house

¹ DIODORUS, I, 45, Booth's translation.

² JOACHIM, Das älteste Buch über Heilkunde, 106.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

of Egyptian records, this possible queen must remain only Teta's mother Shesh, of the pomatum receipt.¹

The minds of the early writers on Egyptian history seem to have had few impressions of this reign except such as were connected with medicine and its practice. Curious indeed were the physiological beliefs of the time.

Treating of this subject, the Ebers Papyrus explains that, "the head contains twenty-two vessels, which draw the spirits into it and send them thence to all parts of the body . . . there are two for the right ear, by which enter the breaths of life; and two for the left ear which in like manner admit the breaths of death."²

All physical ills were caused by the malign influence of evil spirits; they could be driven out by spells or remedies known to the physician, who then restored the patient to health by the use of various mixtures. Some of the formulæ set forth by these early physicians never passed entirely away. In The Dawn of Civilization, M. Maspero says of this.³

"The use of more than one of these remedies became world-wide; the Greeks borrowed them from the Egyptians; we have piously accepted them from the Greeks; and our contemporaries still swallow with resignation many of the abominable mixtures invented on the banks of the Nile long before the building of the pyramids"

The next evidence found of a queen in chronological order is rather a gruesome one. This is nothing more than the dismembered arm of a mummy, which was discovered in the tomb of King Zer, probably the same as Teta, Mena's son. The arm had on it four beautiful bracelets composed of turquoise, and small gold plaques

¹ By some writers she is called the Consort of Teta.

² EBERS, Papyrus; Berlin Medical Papyrus, MASPERO, BRUGSCH, CHABAS.

³ p. 220.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

surmounted by hawks, finely-cut amethysts and gold flowers, tinted stones and a sort of glass paste, all of very delicate workmanship. It is curious that this fragment with its jewels should have escaped destruction when the mummy to which it belonged was torn to pieces. It is supposed that at the time of the original robbery, this arm with its bracelets was hastily torn from the body and thrust aside into the sand for concealment until it could be safely removed; for some reason the robbers never succeeded in finding it again, and so it lay for ages hidden in Zer's tomb. When Mr. Petrie, excavating in the ancient cemetery of Omm el Gaab, chanced upon the tomb and opened it, he found in one corner this fragment of some unknown princess, still wearing the jewels in which she had been buried. The beauty of these ornaments prove the skill of the jeweller's art at that period when the king had first taught his people to live in a "delicate and sumptuous" manner. The queen to whom the ornaments belonged has left no name nor record of any kind; long ago the mummy crumbled to dust, but this one nameless withered arm, covered with its bracelets,¹ still remains to suggest some queen of King Zer, second monarch of the 1st dynasty.

One more name occurs at this time: MERNEIT, a princess of Sais, who seems to have been the wife of Den, fourth king of the 1st dynasty. A fine diorite stela in Cairo, and several other monuments are inscribed with her name. Her tomb existed in the royal cemetery at Abydos, near the great one in which her husband, King Den, was buried; but nothing circumstantial is known regarding her life.

11st Dynasty.

Thinite. Before 4000 B.C.

It is in the records of this period that we first hear of a Queen concerned with the actual government of Egypt.

¹ Now in the Cairo Museum, Jewel Room, Case IV, B.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

This was NE-MAAT-HAP,¹ who was probably a Memphite princess; she is called "the mother of the royal children," and "She whose orders are always obeyed," a title which points to her importance probably as a "Royal Heiress." It is possible that Ne-Maat-Hap was descended from Ba-en-neter, and that, after profiting by his decree, which legalized the active sovereignty of women, she bequeathed the throne to her two sons, Khasekhemui and Neterkhet. The elder of these was but three years of age when he succeeded. His mother was Queen-Regent during his minority, and exercised a supreme power; as evident from official sealings in the name of the queen, which survive. It is not certain who her husband was, but he may have been one of the kings of the IInd dynasty, Perabsen. This seems not unlikely from the fact that in the tomb of Neterkhet, the younger son of Ne-Maat-Hap, only two royal names occur, those of the queen-mother and Perabsen.²

A royal tomb was made for the Queen, and after her death the services attending it were long maintained by special endowment. Ne-Maat-Hap is perhaps to be regarded as the ancestress of a new line of kings, and her memory was honoured by her descendants until the IVth dynasty.

She is probably the same queen-mother Ne-Maat-Hap who is mentioned in the tomb of Methen, a noble high in authority and in the favour of Sneferu. As a reward for valuable services he was given "two hundred portions of "cultivated land, with numerous slaves, both male and female, "and an income of one hundred loaves daily," which was charged to the funeral endowment of Queen Ne-Maat-Hap.³

A further mention of her is made on a scarab, which records the name of "The Mother of Royal Children, Ne-Maat-Hap."⁴

¹ LEPSIUS, Denkmahler, ii, 16, 17; BRUGSCH and BOURIANT, Livre des Rois.

² N. and G., Hist. E., 47-49.

³ LEPSIUS, Denkmahler; MASPERO, D. Civ., p. 294.

⁴ NEWBERRY, Scarabs, pl. IV, 15.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

If there were other princesses of this period who reigned under the law of Ba-en-neter, they have apparently left no records which survive, as the next queen of whom anything definite is known appears two dynasties later, or after a period of some hundreds of years.

CHAPTER II.

QUEENS OF DYNASTIES IV-XI.

IVth Dynasty.

Memphite. Before 3500 B.C.

MERTITEFS, whose name signified "beloved of her father," was the wife of Sneferu, founder of the IVth dynasty.

The historical evidences regarding Mertitefs are found on her statue preserved in the Leyden Museum, and in a commemorative tablet which was discovered at Ghizeh. These records are of historical value as aids in determining the order in which the three great kings of the IVth dynasty ascended the throne, as they show her association with all three kings, Sneferu, Khufu, and Khafra.

In early life she was the Queen of Sneferu, and after his death she seems to have become the wife of his successor Khufu; outliving him in turn, she is later mentioned as the Ama khit, or vassal of Khafra.¹ From these evidences it appears that Mertitefs held regal honours not only from the founder of this famous dynasty, but also from the first two of those kings who built the great pyramids. The Leyden statue of Mertitefs is of a peculiar type, broad-faced, big-eyed, with a wide mouth and strangely heavy features. It is evident that the style of art of this period is not to blame for the coarse representations of the Queen's face: it was IVth dynasty art which produced the famous statues of the Ra-hetep group, and the enthroned Khafra of the Cairo Museum; works of supreme beauty, vitality and power. Artists of consummate skill existed when

¹ MASPERO, Dawn Civ., 272, no. 4, E. de ROUGÉ, Recherches.

PRINCESS NEFERT

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Mertitefs' likeness was made. One would imagine that the best of these would have been employed for the representation of the "Great Favourite" of three successive Pharaohs. The statue, therefore, is puzzling, and hardly to be explained, except by Mr. Petrie's assumption that Mertitefs belonged to an inferior race¹

The sculptures of the IVth dynasty suggest that two or more widely differing races then inhabited the valley of the Nile.

The contrasts and differences in representations of the human form and face are too great to be attributable only to the mannerisms of different artists, which would naturally produce both good and bad work side by side in the same dynasty.

It is therefore possible that Mertitefs, in spite of her high honours and queenly titles, was not of that royal race which exalted her to her three-fold position.

Her lords built the great pyramids which rear their masses above the plains of Ghizeh, to be a never-ending wonder in the eyes of men. Somewhere near them, Mertitefs, who had found such favour in the esteem of three kings, was probably buried in one of the many mastaba tombs, the ruins of which now crowd the vast necropolis surrounding the pyramids.

NEFERT, a princess, probably connected with the house of Sneferu, was the original of the famous statue in the Cairo Museum, where she sits side by side with her husband, General Ra-hetep. The figure is of painted limestone, and is executed with great power and simplicity. The attitude of the princess is one of repose, and the personality is majestic.²

These statues were found in a tomb near the Medûm pyramid, the burial places of Sneferu and his family.

MERI-SE-ANKH is mentioned on several fragments of stone found in the Necropolis of Memphis, and is generally considered to have been the Queen of Khafra, third king of the IVth dynasty.

¹ P's H.E., vol. I, 35.

² Room F, No. 163, Cairo M.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is certain that she had a son, Prince Neb-em-akhet, in whose tomb at Ghizeh she is called a "Royal Wife." There is, however, at Medûm, a temple graffito of the XVIIIth dynasty, which names her as a wife of Sneferu. Mr. Petrie thinks that she may, like Meititefs, have passed from the harem of Sneferu to that of Khufu.¹ On the other hand, M. Maspero, following the views of Lepsius and Mariette, believes her to have been the daughter of Khufu, and the sister and wife of Khafra.²

Her fragmentary records show that she was a devout worshipper of the gods, who in turn were pleased to honour their royal servant. Meri-se-ankh is the last queen known from such monuments of this dynasty as have come to light. The period is remarkable for the extraordinary beauty and power of its sculpture, the marvellous skill of its buildings, and the ease with which its architects handled great masses of material. No other age has left such immortal monuments as those of its great pyramids, reared by the three successive kings: Khufu, Khafra, and Men-kau-Ra. Of this third monarch little is known historically, although he became in early times the hero of many tales. One of these is particularly interesting as touching a certain nameless princess, described only as the daughter of Men-kau-Ra. Herodotus, hearing the story, sets it down as historical.³

"Mycerinus (Men-kau-Ra), governing the common weal
"with great clemency, and seeking by virtue to advance
"his fame, was suddenly daunted by a great misfortune,
"the death of his only daughter; having no more children
"but her, which was the first and greatest heart-break that "befell him in his kingdom. For which cause, being

¹ P.'s H.E., vol. I, 35, 36.

² M.'s D.C., 270, n. 5.

³ HERODOTUS: B. R.'s translation, 105, ff. The spelling is modernized.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

“ stricken with sorrow above measure, and desirous to “ solemnize her funeral by the most royal and princely kind “ of burial that could be devised, he caused an ox to be “ made of wood, inwardly vaulted and hollow within;
“ which, being laid over and garnished most curiously with “ gilt, he enclosed therein the wan and forlorn corpse of his “ best-beloved daughter.

“ This royal tomb was not interred and buried in the “ ground, but remained unto our age in the city Sais in “ open view, standing in a certain parlour of the king’s “ palace ; adorned and set forth for the same purpose with “ most beautiful and costly furniture. The custom is ever-
“ more in the day-time to cast into the belly of the ox, “ sweet and precious odours of all sorts that may be gotten,
“ and in the night to kindle a lamp which burneth by the “ tomb till the next day. . . . The ox wherein the “ young princess lay was sumptuously clad, and arranged
“ all the body with a gorgeous mantle of Phœnicia, his “ head and neck being laid over with braces and plates of “ gold of a marvellous thickness. Between his horns was “ set a globe or circle of gold, glistening as the sun.
“ Neither is the ox standing and borne up upon his feet,
“ but kneeleth as it were upon his knees ; equal in bigness
“ to a heifer.”

“ The manner is once a year to bring this image out of “ the parlour wherein it is kept, having first of all well “ beaten and cudgelled a certain image of one of their “ saints, whom in this case we think it not lawful to us to “ name. The talk goeth that the lady besought the king,
“ her father, that being dead, she might once a year behold
“ the sun ; whereof sprang the custom and manner afore“ said.”

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Vth Dynasty.

Elephantine. Before 3000 B.C.

In the remains of this dynasty we meet with the names of only two queens, the first of whom was

NEFER-HETEP-ES, a "Royal Mother" in the time of King Sahura. With the opening of the dynasty the crown had passed to a new royal family, and the chiefs of the princely house of Elephantine had assumed the government. Nefer-hetep-es may, then, have been a princess of one of the old Memphite lines, by marriage with whom the new Pharaoh made good his claims to the throne. The queen's name is preserved on a limestone slab from the tomb of one Persen, who recorded certain benefits received from the queen-mother.¹

KAKA-HEKENU is mentioned on a vase found at Sakkara in the famous tomb of Ti, a noble of the Vth dynasty.² There is no evidence identifying her with any king, except the slight clue which may be afforded by the history of the owner of the tomb.

Ti was keeper of the pyramids of the Kings Nefer-ar-ka-ra and of Ne-user-ra. His tomb furnishings, among which the vase naming the queen was found, would naturally be connected with the king whom he had served ; it is therefore likely that one of Ti's masters, Nefer-ar-ka-ra, or Ne-user-ra, was either the husband or the son of Ka-ka-he-kenu.

VIth Dynasty.

Elephantine. Before 3000 B.C.

MERI-RA-ANKHNES, "Royal Wife," and "Royal Mother," was the queen of Pepi I., third king of the VIth

¹ MARIETTE, Mastabas, 300

² P.'s H.E., vol I, 74.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

dynasty. Her genealogy is given on a tablet, found at Abydos, and stands as follows.¹

A second tablet gives her name as Pepi-ankhnes.² The Queen's mother Nebt seems to have been a royal princess whose rights Meri-ra-ankhnes inherited. Her eldest son, Mer-en-ra, ascended the throne and died young; his mummy, with its boyish side lock of hair, is still in existence and may be seen in the Cairo Museum.³ He was succeeded by his brother Pepi II., who is said to have mounted the throne of the Pharaohs at the age of six years. Shortly after his accession, a commemorative stela was carved on the rocks of the Wady Maghara quarries in the Sinai Peninsula. On this tablet the Queen-mother Meri-ra-ankhnes appears with a prominence and use of royal titles, which make it apparent that she filled the office of regent for her son during his minority.⁴

Brugsch takes a different view of the position occupied by this queen,⁵ whom he thinks was not of the blood royal. Her name as it appears on one tablet reads Pepi-ankhnes, characters which so closely resemble those of her husband as to suggest that after her marriage with Pepi he conferred the name, together with the queenly titles, upon his wife of low origin. Her tomb was found in the Necropolis of Abydos,⁶ although those of the three Pharaohs, Pepi I., Pepi II. and Mer-en-ra, her husband and two sons, are among the ruined pyramids of Sakkara. The Queen's tomb had been sumptuously furnished with sarcophagus,

¹ MARIETTE, Abydos, 523; E. de ROUGÉ, R. M., 129-184.

² M.'s D.C., 422.

³ Cairo M., Room C¹, 106

⁴ LEPSIUS, Denkmäher, II, 116, a.

⁵ Egypt under the Pharaohs, 48 ⁶ B's. E.P., 48.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

offering tables and doors, made of the rose granite of Aswan, to procure which one of the King's officers had been sent up the Nile. He has left an account of this royal commission in his tomb inscriptions at Abydos.

Meri-ra-ankhnes was not the only queen of Pepi I. The earliest use of the honourable title "Great Spouse of the King,"¹ is found with AMTES, , of whom sinister mention is made in the contemporary records of Uni, an officer high in the favour of King Pepi. Uni's memorial in his tomb at Abydos begins in a style highly self-glorious, with reference to the heavy responsibilities placed upon him by the monarch, and the great rewards that had followed the successful accomplishment of his duties. Uni then declares that he alone was entrusted by the King with the trial of Queen Amtes, the chief royal wife. Having carried out the enquiry, he, with the help of one other judge, wrote the report of his investigations and his conduct of the whole affair, which was greatly to the King's satisfaction.

We have no hint of the nature of the crime with which the Queen was charged, nor the outcome of her trial. Queen Amtes appears in history only as a royal wife, on trial at the King's charge. However satisfactory to Pepi, as Uni asserts, the results may have been, it is by no means clear how they affected the royal lady herself. Uni, who was her accuser, her defender and her judge, has kept the secret of a dark page in King Pepi's life. No hint is given of the accused Queen's fate: whether it was one of banishment or death, or whether she was acquitted and reinstated in the King's favour.

To Uni it was a matter of great pride that he had been entrusted with so delicate and serious a matter as the trial of the King's "Great Spouse," and he sums up his records concerning it with the words: "My duties were to super-

¹ M.'s D.C.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"intend the royal gardens, and never before me had a man in my position been initiated into the secrets of the Royal Harem, but his Majesty initiated me into them because my wisdom pleased his Majesty more than that of any other of his lieges."¹

The circumstance of this elevation of a superintendent of gardens to be the judge of a queen, is as surprising to modern readers as it seems to have been to Uni himself.

Late in the VIth dynasty appears an uncertain figure with the title, "Ruler of Both Lands."

MEN-KA-RA NETAQERTI or NITOCRIS

This is the first woman recorded by Egyptian tradition as an independent sovereign. Around her name legend has woven so many tales, and has so hopelessly confounded her identity with that of other individuals both of earlier and later periods, that it is difficult to get at any historical truth concerning her. It has been supposed from the testimony of the King's list on the temple walls of Abydos, and of the Turin Papyrus, that at the close of the VIth dynasty there was a monarch with the names Men-ka-ra Netaqerti. Manetho's list also ends the dynasty with this queen, and adds ² "She was the noblest and most beautiful woman of her time, fair in colour, and the builder of the third pyramid." The legendary history of the "luddy queen" is detailed by Herodotus, elaborated by the Greeks, confused with the records of earlier monarchs, and enlivened by the questionable adventures of later personages, until any story which may have belonged to an actual individual of this period is quite lost in the mazes of fiction.

According to Herodotus, Nitocris was the wife of her brother Metesouphis II, who ascended the throne, but was ¹ Insc. Uni, II., 11-13. ERMAN in Zeitschrift, 1882, 10, 12.

² UNGER's Edition, 102.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

shortly after murdered, and Nitocris became the solè ruler. After this the one motive of her life was revenge, and the tale makes her resort to strangely involved and elaborate means to accomplish it.

She caused to be built a great subterranean hall, which could be flooded by the waters of the Nile conveyed through a secret channel. This completed, she gave a banquet, and summoned her guests, among whom were the murderers of her brother. While the unsuspecting company was feasting, the queen opened the hidden water channel, and the river rushing down upon the guests, drowned them in the midst of their festivities. Having accomplished this wholesale revenge, Nitocris feared the anger of her people, and, preferring to take her own life rather than to be murdered in turn, she "threw herself into a great chamber filled with ashes" and was smothered.

Manetho states that during her twelve years' reign she completed the third pyramid, added to it a red granite casing, and made a second tomb chamber in the heart of the pyramid, directly over the secret one in which lay the body of King Men-kau-Ra. In this added chamber Nitocris is said to have been buried in a magnificent blue basalt sarcophagus. Modern investigation has proved that this pyramid has at some remote time been enlarged ; that it had two tomb chambers, and once contained a splendid sarcophagus of blue basalt, fragments of which were found in the centre chamber. From these facts certain authorities, among whom are Perring, E. de Rouge, Bunsen, and Lepsius, held that Queen Nitocris actually did enlarge the pyramid, and was buried in the blue basalt sarcophagus. Petrie thinks that the only origin for this tale of the usurpation of Men-kau-Ra's pyramid by Men-ka-Ra Netaqerti, is in a confusion arising from the similarity of the two names. Nitocris is described by ancient writers as having a "red and white complexion," and is called the "rosy cheeked." In later times she was known to the Greeks by the name of Rhodopis, literally, the "red faced."

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

There was, however, a real Rhodopis, an Ionian woman of infamous celebrity living in the time of the XXVIth dynasty, who had been the favourite of Psammetichus or of Amasis. Many of the tales told of this woman became transferred to the legendary Nitocris, until the evil character of Rhodopis became that of the Egyptian queen, with apparently no better foundation than the chance expression "red faced" occurring in early descriptions of the Queen.

By this transition, Nitocris-Rhodopis becomes the heroine of a Cinderella-like tale, which relates that one day while she was bathing in the river an eagle descended, and, snatching her sandal, flew away with it to Memphis. There the King was holding his court in the open air, when the eagle, passing overhead, dropped the sandal into the King's lap. The monarch picked it up, and so fell in love with the delicacy of its shape, that he sent forth into all the kingdom to search for its owner. At last the messengers arrived at the city of Naucratis, and there found the beautiful woman to whom the sandal belonged. She was taken to the King, who married her, and when she died he caused her to be buried in a great pyramid, i.e., that of Men-kau-Ra.

Herodotus, Diodorus, and Strabo all note that the Greeks believed this third pyramid to have been "the work of the courtesan Rhodopis."

Still another tale was founded on the belief that all the tombs and pyramids of Egypt were haunted by the ghosts of those buried in them; probably a survival of the ancient Egyptian belief that the "ka" or "double" of every man revisited his mummied body in the tomb. According to this legend, the uneasy spirit of Queen Rhodopis haunted the place where her body lay. She appeared always as a nude woman of wondrous beauty wandering about the pyramid, where she was seen by many people. It was an unusually bold spirit, and instead of coming at night only, like other ghosts, was to be seen in the blazing light of noon or at sunset. She was bent on destruction, and the unlucky person who saw her fatal smile and approached her was bereft of his senses, and thereafter wandered mad in the desert.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Whether there ever was a beautiful queen of Egypt called Nitocris, whose romantic career and tragic fate gave some foundation to these accounts, has been a debated question. Certain Egyptologists have even held that the name Men-ka-Ra Netaqerti was not that of a queen at all, but of a man who was the last king of the dynasty. No contemporary records of the reign have been found, and the only real evidence of this ruler occurs in the mention of the name Men-ka-Ra Netaqerti in the Abydos table of kings, sculptured some seventeen hundred years after Nitocris is supposed to have reigned, and in the lists of Manetho, composed more than eleven hundred years later. It is reasonable to suppose, however, that both of these lists were founded on earlier records which must have existed in the days of the Egyptian historian as well as at the time of Seti I., under whom the Abydos tablet was sculptured. At present there is no conclusive evidence to prove the existence or non-existence of Queen Nitocris.¹

Fragmentary evidences of yet other queens remain who probably lived during this period. Mutilated inscriptions, in which only one syllable can still be read, such as "Peri-," "Ankh," etc., testify to other princesses among the vast number of those royal women of Egypt who, whether they played important parts or not in the history of their times, have disappeared from human knowledge, leaving no trace.

A singular absence of monuments of any sort marks the whole of that period which covers the VIIth, VIIIth, IXth, and Xth dynasties. It would seem to have been a time of weak rulers and ineffectual reigns, which in few instances had the vigour to leave an impress on tomb, temple, pyramid, or sculptured stone. Great changes took place in the empire during those unknown years, for whereas the powerful monarchs of the early kingdom had governed the realm from Mena's royal city of Memphis, and reared their monuments in its vicinity, yet when Egypt begins to emerge from the darkness of that unrecorded time, the scene has entirely changed; Memphis has been abandoned, and the feudal lords of Thebes have assumed the crown. From this time on, through the most stirring scenes of its history, Thebes was the capital of the kingdom, and Theban its greatest Pharaohs. More than once the prestige of the lordly city was threatened, but as often it emerged triumphant from temporary eclipse.

¹ The subject is fully treated by HALL, Hellenistic Journal, xxiv, 208.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The origin of Thebes is lost in antiquity. Diodorus called it the most ancient city in Egypt; other accounts credit Mena himself with its foundation, or make it a colony from Memphis. The mountains here sweep back from the river, and enclose a wide and fertile plain. Thebes lay on both banks of the Nile, and in the records of the time was designated as "The City of the South." Its god was Amen, and with the rise of the Theban princes to power, their god also increased in importance, until, from being a minor deity, Amen-Ra became the chief god of Egypt.

Monarchs vied with one another in adding to the splendour of their capital: temples and palaces arose on both sides of the river; obelisks, colossal statues, gardens and long sphinx-bordered avenues, made beautiful the city of Amen. To its sovereigns, Thebes was "the horizon on earth—the eye of the Universal Lord—his heart's throne."¹

The country was divided into nomes or provinces, each one of which was ruled by a prince who held his fief tributary to the Pharaoh, and was bound to aid his sovereign in war. These princes, like the great feudal barons of later

¹ Karnak, Obelisk of Hatshepsut.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

times, occasionally became so powerful as to make and unmake kings, and to wage successful war against the monarch, even to the extent of the usurpation of the double crown by one of their own number. It was thus that some Theban prince at a time anterior to the XIth dynasty, fought his way to the title of "King of the North and South." This prince was the probable ancestor of the Mentuheteps, a family of kings whose names are prominent at the beginning of the new dynasty.

XIth Dynasty.

Theban. About 3000 B.C.

Confused and uncertain as are the records of this time, there still occur among them the names of several queens, some of whom are connected with the known Pharaohs of the age, while others are unplaced. The first of these is AAM,¹ mother of the king Mentu-hetep II. The history of this monarch is chiefly derived from inscriptions on the rocks of the Wady Hammamet quarries, whither the King sent servants to cut the stone for his sarcophagus. In one of these inscriptions the "Royal Mother Aām" is mentioned. The titles with which her name is accompanied suggest that she, like Meri-Ra-ankhnes of the VIth dynasty, may have been queen-regent during the early youth of her son; also that Men-tu-hetep obtained the crown through her rights.

AĀII,² in company with Mentu-hetep III., holds lonely state among the rocks of a valley about four miles from Silsileh in Upper Egypt. This tablet is commemorative of the most important king of the Mentu-hetep line, and represents him as a colossal figure receiving tribute. Behind him stands a queen holding in one hand a staff, and in the other a lotus blossom, emblem of royalty. Her legend runs: "The Royal Mother, his beloved Aāh," which suggests that she may have been a descendant of queens and a royal heiress. She was probably the King's mother, as his queen was AASHAIT, "The Royal Wife—his beloved."

¹ LEPSIUS, D., ii, 149, f. P.'s H.E., vol. I, 132.

² EISENLOHR, P.S.B.A., 1881, 100; P.'s H.E., vol. I, 138; E., S., 489.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Recent excavations in the Theban hills have brought to light the most ancient temple of Thebes, that of Mentu-hetep III.¹ It lies near Hatshepsut's temple at Deir el-Bahari, and was perhaps the model on which that famous building was planned. In the temple of Mentu-hetep, a curious and unique cemetery was found. The burial vaults surrounded the central platform of the building, and were excavated in the rock from twelve to fifteen feet below the pavement. These tombs had been constructed for several women, all of whom bore the titles, "The Royal Favourite, the only one, the Priestess of Hathor."

Several of the sarcophagi were intact and beautifully sculptured. The names of these princesses, found on various fragments of their tombs, were Henhenet, Kaut, Sadhe, Kemsit, Nefershushusa, etc., all of whom were priestesses and at the same time attached to the king's harem. Finely sculptured slabs show various attendants making offerings to the souls of these princesses.

The Priestess Sadhe in one scene receives a bowl presented to her with the words—"Beer for thy Ghost." In each tomb was placed the skeleton of a cow, the animal sacred to the goddess Hathor, whose shrine the royal favourites had served. Other fragments from this temple represent King Mentu-hetep accompanied by his queen, Aashait, whom, from her portrait, the excavators judged to have been a Nubian.

The tombs of other queens of this age are perhaps to be found in the neighbourhood of Mentu-hetep's temple, as, for instance, that of a queen,

¹ MM NAVILLE and HALL

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

NEFERÛ, whose burial place is beneath the lower terrace of the neighbouring temple of Hatshepsut. With this queen may be identified the pedestal of a wooden statuette in the collection of M. Dattari, at Cairo.¹ The pedestal has an inscription in which Neferu is described as a "Divine Wife," the earliest instance yet known of the use of this title.

TUMEM,² is the name of a queen also connected by some writers with Mentuhetep III., although by others she is called an unclassed queen. Her tomb was found near that of Queen Neferu.³ To this group of unknown royal princesses, the wives and mothers of the Mentu-hetep line, cannot be assigned the following names :

SHERTSAT, known from an inscription of her son, Prince Heru-nefer, who calls himself the "son of King Mentu-hetep, and the Great Royal Wife Shertsat."⁴

SENT, whose name and titles of "Heiress, Royal Wife" and "Royal Mother," exist at Khataaneh in the Delta.⁵

MENTU-HETEP, a queen known only from her coffin inscription and a toilet box. She was "The Great Royal Wife Mentu-hetep, begotten of the vizier, the keeper of the palace, Send-hena-ef, and born of the heiress Sebek-hetep."⁶

The evidence regarding the Mentu-hetep kings, shows that they do not all belong to the same dynasty, but were scattered; the first three having lived in the XIth, while others of the name have been assigned to some period after the XIIth.

¹ Pub. by P. E. NEWBERRY in P.S.B.A., 1901.

² Mission Arch. Franc., 1, 134.

³ MASPERO, S N., 240, n. 3.

⁴ P.S.B.A., xiv, 41.

⁵ MEYER, Geschichte, ix.

⁶ P.S.B.A., xiv, 41; Z.A., xxx, 46; xxxi, 23.

CHAPTER III.

QUEENS OF THE XIIITH DYNASTY.

Theban. About 2700 (?) B.C.

THE monarchy founded by Menes, and developed by the Pharaohs of the IVth dynasty, lived thereafter through a thousand years of history with varying fortunes, which slowly tended more and more towards ruin, until, with the Xth dynasty, the ancient empire passed away in confusion.

It sprang to renewed life in the XIth, which opened that period now known as the "Middle Empire," and the name of Amen-em-hat I., of the XIIth dynasty, ushered in a great Egyptian renaissance. The large number of monuments of this time, and the magnificence of its art, prove the astonishing quickening into renewed life which animated the pulse of the empire, and found expression in every line into which man's activity can be directed.

The monarchs of this dynasty, the great Amenemhats and Usertsens, came of a splendid race, if they resembled those faces which now gaze from the monuments of their time. One is strangely impressed by the vigorous personality of these statues, which seem to set at defiance the three thousand years that have elapsed since the empire, built by the kings whom they represent, crumbled into dust.

The first princess to appear in the history of the new era is a wife or daughter of Amenemhat II., third king of the dynasty: NEB-KAU-RA, "Royal Daughter, joined to the Beautiful White Crown."

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The name and titles occur on a cylinder-seal of blue glazed steatite, and appear to prove her the heiress of Upper Egypt.¹ Amenemhat was succeeded by Usertsen II., whose queen was NEFERT, , a name signifying the good, or beautiful. A fine portrait statue of this queen, in black granite, was found at Tanis among the temple ruins. The work has both distinction and charm, in spite of its mutilated state. The inlaid eyes and eyebrows are gone, the nose is broken, and the arms are almost entirely lacking. The large wig is parted in the middle, and hangs in two heavy tresses over the shoulders. On the breast, which is but slightly indicated, is an engraved pectoral containing the name of Usertsen II. The queen is seated on a throne bearing the titles, "The Hereditary Princess, the greatly "praised, the Great Favourite, the beloved Consort of the "King, the Ruler of all women, the King's Daughter of his "body, Nefert."

A second portrait statue of Queen Nefert was found at Tanis; both of these memorials are now in the Cairo Museum.² The name of her father is not given, but as she was the "King's Daughter" she may have been the heiress of Amenemhat II.

Among her titles Queen Nefert is not styled "Royal Mother"; it is therefore doubtful if she was the mother of those princesses who were probably daughters of Usertsen II., and whose names are recorded as Atmu-nefereu, Sat-hathor, and Sent-es-senb, or of his son, Usertsen III.

NEFERT-HENT was a queen of Usertsen II. or III. She was interred, with other members of the family, in a tomb where her name is inscribed on a sandstone sarcophagus. There she figures as Queen-Consort, but not as Royal

¹ Timmins Col. Pub. by NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A., 1905

² Nos. 200 and 201, Room H.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Mother. The young queen had died at the age of twenty-four or twenty-five, as indicated by her mummy.¹

MERSEKER is another princess in some way connected with Usertsen III. On a rock inscription at Semneh² there is a representation of Thotmes III. adoring the deified king, Usertsen, and a "Great Royal Wife" who is there named Merseker; no trace of her is found in contemporary records. The burial places of the Amenemhats and Usertsens were in the plains of Dashur and the Fayûm. Amid the ruins which cover the now desert tracks, the pyramids of at least two of these Pharaohs and the tombs of their families have been identified. The North brick pyramid of Dashur seems to have been the tomb of Usertsen III. It is of a singular and original construction, unlike other pyramids. Upon its northern face, and opposite the north-east and north-west corners, there are wells descending to a long subterranean gallery. This passage, which connects the two shafts, has several openings into chambers, containing sarcophagi. When M. de Morgan entered the vault in 1894, the coffins were still occupied by their royal tenants, the princesses of the families of Usertsen and of Amenemhat III.

The names were of the Queen Nefert-hent and of the king's sisters and wives, Sat-hathor, Sent-es-senb, Ment, and Merit. In one of the passages a number of splendid ornaments were found. The wooden coffins had mouldered, the mummies crumbled when touched, the jewels only remained. One of the princesses had worn a coronet of gold leaves and forget-me-nots, set with precious stones. There were also many other articles in gold and enamel, including necklaces, daggers, pendants, coronets, charms, and bracelets, all of exquisite workmanship. These jewels, which had formed the burial outfit of the XIIth dynasty princesses, were rescued from the dust of mortality in which they lay, and are now in the Cairo Museum, forming a collection of unsurpassed beauty.¹ The pieces are too delicate ever to have been in actual use, and are supposed to have been constructed solely for burial ornaments. Possibly the flail crowns, necklaces, and bracelets were made in imitation of jewels worn by the princesses in life.

¹ DE MORGAN, Fouilles à Dahchour.

² LEPSIUS, D., iii, 55a.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Much of this jewellery belonged to the princess Sathathor. One piece bears the name of Usertsen II., and another that of Usertsen III., thus indicating the princess' place in the royal family. One of her ornaments, a pectoral or breast-plate of gold richly inlaid with carnelian and blue paste, is designed like the one engraved on the breast of Queen Nefert's great statue.

Near the burial place of these princesses, M. de Morgan found the tombs of King Hor, and of the Queen NUBHETEP-TAKRUDIT, "Royal Daughter; Great Royal Wife who is united to the Beautiful White Crown."

The coffin represents her as wearing the uræus and vulture crown, the insignia of Egyptian queens. She was probably the daughter of Amenemhat III., and the wife of King Hor, who is said to have been Amenemhat's heir and co-regent. Hor must have died young, as he did not succeed to an independent reign. When the queen's tomb was opened,² it was found to be undisturbed, its contents still remaining as they had been placed more than 4,000 years before. The sarcophagus held a gilded wooden coffin, in which lay the mummy of the queen, a woman of about forty-five. The jewels of the dead princess were beautifully wrought in gold and sparkled with Egyptian emeralds, carnelian and lapis-lazuli. There were diadems, necklaces, bracelets, sceptres, daggers and amulets, besides various articles for the toilet. In a case of alabaster vases, each vase was marked with the name of the perfume which had filled it. The outfit contained also a mirror of blue enamelled silver, vases, and plates of pottery, offerings of birds and of beef, and four canopic jars with lids made in the likeness of human heads. Two or three scarabs are known with the name and titles of Nub-hetep-takrudit.¹

¹ Cairo M., Jewel Room. The jewellery is fully described, and illustrated by de MORGAN, in Fouilles à Dahchour.

² de MORGAN, Fouilles à Dahchour.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

These XIIth dynasty princesses, buried in so regal a state, had passed their lives also under conditions of luxury and splendour, a fleeting glimpse of which is given in a contemporary record regarding the building of one of the royal palaces. This was described as a gold-adorned edifice, in which the shining blue ceilings were of lapis-lazuli, and the doors were of copper.² It is perhaps to the same royal families that two or three other princesses belong, who are known to us at present only by name.

ANKET-NEFERT-UBEN, and NUB-EM-ANT, were two royal heiresses, each having the title, "The Hereditary Chieftainess." Both princesses are known from scarabs which are engraved with their names and titles.³

PTAH-NEFERU. This princess is connected with the greatest king of the dynasty, Amenemhat III. She has been called by one authority, "The Favourite Consort of the King"⁴; and by others is said to have been his daughter.⁵ Whatever relationship existed between them, it is certain that she was buried by his side, in the great pyramid of Hawara in the Fayûm Oasis. The pyramid was opened by Petrie, and found to be one of the most singular constructions in Egypt. The explorer describes it as entered from the south side, and says he⁶ "descended a long staircase which ended in a dumb chamber. The roof of this, if slid aside, showed another passage filled with blocks; this was a mere blind to direct attention from the real passage which stood ostentatiously open.

¹ NEWBERRY, Scarabs, pl. xii, 26; xliv, 13.

² Hieratic Papyrus.

³ N., Sc., pl. ix. 35, 39; in P. Col. and v. B. Coll.

⁴ M.'s D.C., 520.

⁵ P.'s H.E., vol. I, 195.

⁶ P.'s H.E., vol. I, 185-6.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"A plunderer had, however, fruitlessly mined his way through all these blocks. On going down the real passage, another dumb chamber was reached; another sliding trap-door was passed; another passage led to a third chamber, a third trap-door was passed; and now a passage led along, past one side of the real sepulchre; and to amuse explorers, two false wells open in the passage floor, and the wrong side of the passage is filled with masonry blocks, fitted in. Yet by some means the plunderer found a cross trench in the passage floor which led to the chamber. Here another device was met. The chamber had no door, but was entered solely by one of the immense roof blocks, weighing forty-five tons, being left raised, and afterwards dropped into place on closing the pyramid."

Such was the complicated arrangement by which Amenemhat sought to secure to himself and his princess a safe resting place for ever. But the winding passages which led nowhere; the dumb chambers with nothing in them; the false doors; the ponderous stone traps, sliding roofs, pitfalls and snares, were all of no avail; for ancient plunderers had torn the secret out of the heart of the pyramid, and the modern explorer found only charred bits of diorite and lapis-lazuli, to testify to the original magnificence of the tomb furnishing.

The pyramid is not more remarkable than the sepulchral chamber in its midst. This is hewn out of a single block of yellow quartzite, beautifully cut and polished. Within it is the stone sarcophagus of the king, and by its side a second coffin made of blocks of stone built in between the wall and the sarcophagus. It must have been in this that the body of Ptah-neferu reposed. Remains of an alabaster altar, and of a dish in the form of a duck,¹ were found in one of the passages; they bore the name of Ptah-neferu, and formed part of the tomb furniture of this queen or princess. Other records of her exist in a magical wand,¹ and on a headless sphinx of black granite,² both of which are inscribed with her name.

¹ Cairo M., Room H, 197; PETRIE, Kahun, V.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The burial chamber of the royal pair was found partly filled with water. This may have been due to natural infiltration, or was perhaps introduced by some hidden channel as an additional safeguard. Græco-Roman explorers frequently found water in the recesses of pyramids, and thought it had been brought in by artificial means.

Perhaps Ptah-neferu was the princess referred to in a tale of this time, repeated by Diodorus. In his mention of the famous Lake Moeris, said to have been one of the achievements of Amenemhat III., Diodorus says :

"The revenue arising from the fish taken in this lake he (the king) gave to his wife to buy her dresses, which amounted to a talent of silver every day. For there were in it two-and-twenty sorts of fish, and so vast a number were taken that those who were employed continually to salt them up (though they were multitudes of people) could hardly perform it."³

The brilliant period known as the XIIth dynasty apparently ends with a queen's reign,

SEBEK-NEFERU-RA.

"The Horus beloved of Ra ; The Living
"beloved of Sebek ; The Royal
"Daughter ; The Lady of the Two
"Lands ; The Established One who rises
"as the Golden Horus ; The King of
"the North and South."

¹ Pub. by DARESSY, Textes et Dessins Magiques, 49.

² Mr. NEWBERRY saw this sphinx in the shop of a Luxor dealer, and published it in P.S.B.A., 1903.

³ DIODORUS SICULUS, i, 4.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"A plunderer had, however, fruitlessly mined his way through all these blocks. On going down the real passage, another dumb chamber was reached; another sliding trap-door was passed; another passage led to a third chamber, a third trap-door was passed; and now a passage led along, past one side of the real sepulchre; and to amuse explorers, two false wells open in the passage floor, and the wrong side of the passage is filled with masonry blocks, fitted in. Yet by some means the plunderer found a cross trench in the passage floor which led to the chamber. Here another device was met. The chamber had no door, but was entered solely by one of the immense roof blocks, weighing forty-five tons, being left raised, and afterwards dropped into place on closing the pyramid."

Such was the complicated arrangement by which Amenemhat sought to secure to himself and his princess a safe resting place for ever. But the winding passages which led nowhere; the dumb chambers with nothing in them; the false doors; the ponderous stone traps, sliding roofs, pitfalls and snares, were all of no avail; for ancient plunderers had torn the secret out of the heart of the pyramid, and the modern explorer found only charred bits of diorite and lapis-lazuli, to testify to the original magnificence of the tomb furnishing.

The pyramid is not more remarkable than the sepulchral chamber in its midst. This is hewn out of a single block of yellow quartzite, beautifully cut and polished. Within it is the stone sarcophagus of the king, and by its side a second coffin made of blocks of stone built in between the wall and the sarcophagus. It must have been in this that the body of Ptah-neferu reposed. Remains of an alabaster altar, and of a dish in the form of a duck,¹ were found in one of the passages; they bore the name of Ptah-neferu, and formed part of the tomb furniture of this queen or princess. Other records of her exist in a magical wand,¹ and on a headless sphinx of black granite,² both of which are inscribed with her name.

¹ Cairo M., Room H, 197; PETRIE, Kahun, V.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The burial chamber of the royal pair was found partly filled with water. This may have been due to natural infiltration, or was perhaps introduced by some hidden channel as an additional safeguard. Græco-Roman explorers frequently found water in the recesses of pyramids, and thought it had been brought in by artificial means.

Perhaps Ptah-neferu was the princess referred to in a tale of this time, repeated by Diodorus. In his mention of the famous Lake Moeris, said to have been one of the achievements of Amenemhat III., Diodorus says :

"The revenue arising from the fish taken in this lake he (the king) gave to his wife to buy her dresses, which amounted to a talent of silver every day. For there were in it two-and-twenty sorts of fish, and so vast a number were taken that those who were employed continually to salt them up (though they were multitudes of people) could hardly perform it."³

The brilliant period known as the XIIth dynasty apparently ends with a queen's reign,

SEBEK-NEFERU-RA.

"The Horus beloved of Ra ; The Living
"beloved of Sebek ; The Royal
"Daughter ; The Lady of the Two
"Lands ; The Established One who rises
"as the Golden Horus ; The King of
"the North and South."

¹ Pub. by DARESSY, Textes et Dessins Magiques, 49.

² Mr. NEWBERRY saw this sphinx in the shop of a Luxor dealer, and published it in P.S.B.A., 1903.

³ DIODORUS SICULUS, i, 4.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

This queen was the daughter of Amenemhat III., and the sister of Amenemhat IV. She is by some authorities said to have been also the wife of the latter, and after his death to have reigned alone for three years, ten months, and eighteen days¹ The records of her reign, although slight, associate Sebek-neferu-Ra with the great building enterprises of her father at Hawara, where many fragments bearing her name have been found.

As Royal Heiress, she had, perhaps, some share in the kingdom during Amenemhat's life, or possibly it was she alone who had the energy to carry on the Hawara buildings after his death. It is certain that no record remains connecting her brother Amenemhat IV. with the great reign of his father. On the contrary, the name of the princess, Sebek-neferu-Ra, is the only other one found in the temple ruins of Amenemhat III. She probably added to that temple which lies south of the pyramid, adjoining it. Petrie has found in the ruins of this site proof of the former existence of an immense building, 1,000 by 800 feet in extent, "an area great enough to contain all the temples "of Karnak and of Luxor."²

The remains indicate a great central passage with two crossways, from which numerous halls and courts opened. All of the stone which formed the huge structure has disappeared, and the site has been complicated by a village of brick houses built in Roman times, over the temple area. In these scattered and extensive ruins, we doubtless have the remains of the famous "Labyrinth," which so astonished the ancients as to be called by them one of the seven wonders of the world Herodotus, in his description of it, says : "The Labyrinth surpasses even the "pyramids, for it has twelve courts enclosed with walls "with doors opposite each other . . . It contains two "kinds of rooms, some under ground and some above

¹ LEPSIUS, Auswahl, pl. 5, col. 7, 1, 2 ; M.'s D.C., 527.

² P.'s H.E., vol. I, 188.

"ground over them, to the number of three thousand, fifteen hundred of each. The rooms above ground I myself went through, and saw and relate from personal inspection. But the underground rooms I know only from report, for the Egyptians who have charge of the building would on no account show me them, saying that these were the sepulchres of the kings who originally built this Labyrinth, and of the sacred crocodiles."¹

Wonderful tales of the marvels of this place are related by other writers, who agree that the number of rooms, passages, and courts was so great, that once in them no stranger could find his way out of them without a guide. There is nothing to show what part of the building was due to Sebek-neferu-Ra. Besides the frequent recurrences of her name in the Hawara ruins,² it again appears on a fine cylinder-seal³ of a light-green glaze, in which the characters are filled in with dark-green paste. This seal supplies all of the queen's titles as given above. A rock sphinx at Khataaneh may possibly be ascribed to her. Her name connects her with the god Sebek, who was the chief deity worshipped in the Fayûm. Some significance may exist in the similarity of the names Sebek-neferu-Ra and of the Sebek-hetep family of the next dynasty. The Queen, however, is nowhere mentioned as Royal Mother, and there is nothing to prove her possible connection with the succeeding age of Sebek-heteps.

¹ HERODOTUS, II, 148.

² STRABO, XVII, 37.

³ L., D., II, 140. P, H., XXVII, 12, P, K., XI.

⁴ B.M., No 16,581, pub. by BIRCH in 1872. PETRIE, 1895.

CHAPTER IV.

DYNASTIES XIII-XVI.

XIIIth Dynasty.

Theban. Before 2000 B.C.

NEAR the middle of the obscure period now known as the XIIIth dynasty, the monuments commemorate the names of two women belonging to the family of Sebek-hetep II., twentieth king of his line. AUHET-ABU was his mother. She was not a king's wife, as her husband was "the divine father (or priest) Mentu-hetep." She is therefore called only "The Royal Mother" of Sebek-hetep.

NENNA, or ANNA,¹ was Sebek-hetep's queen, and appears as "Great Royal Wife joined to the Beautiful White Crown," and mother of two daughters called Auget-tatta and Auhet-abu. A stela in the Louvre,² a tablet at Vienna,³ and some scarabs,⁴ are the sources from which the existence of these princesses of Sebek-hetep's family is established.

KEMA and SENB-SEN are recorded only as "The Royal Mother and Royal Wife," respectively, of a King Nefer-hetep, whose father is named as "the divine father Haankh-f."⁵ One of the Sebek-heteps had also a Royal Mother Kema, and it is therefore supposed that these two kings were brothers, joint heirs of the Queen Kema, and that they perhaps reigned as co-regents. Such records as

¹ BUDGE, H.E., vol. iii, 95.

² PRISSE, Monuments, viii.

³ Rec., vii, 188.

⁴ Cairo M., Louvre ; M. Coll. ; P., H.Sc., 290-92.

⁵ L, D, ii, 151 ; P., H.Sc., 293-298.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

exist regarding this family are found at Kainak, and on the water-worn rocks of the first cataract at Aswan and Sehel. The queen of Sebek-hetep III. appears as ZA—N on the fragment of an ebony box now in the Cairo Museum,¹ and on a piece of a blue-glazed vase in the Ashmolcan Museum at Oxford.² The inscription on this vase records a princess, "Nebt-ant—born of the Royal Wife Za—n, possessing the quality of worth."

HA-ANKII-S is the name of a queen of whom no contemporary record is known. She is mentioned in an inscription of her great granddaughter Per-nub, whose father was son of "the royal courtier Amena, son of Queen Ha-ankh-s." This stela,³ found at Koptos, apparently dates from the reign of Sebek-hetep IV., and as it puts the queen back two or three generations earlier, she may have had some connection with that royal house to which Queen Kema also belonged.

NUB-EM-HAT is mentioned in the same inscription as the Great Royal Wife, probably the queen of Sebek-hetep IV. Her titles imply full royal inheritance, but nothing further is known of her beyond the fact that she was the mother of "The King's Daughter Sebek-em-heb," also recorded in Per-nub's stela

NUB-KHA-ES.

"The Great Heiress; The Greatly
"Favoured; The Ruler of all Women;
"The Great Royal Wife united to the "Crown."

The princess who bore these titles was the queen of Sebek-em-sauf, a king dating from the end of the XIIIth dynasty. A stela in the Louvre gives her name and titles,

¹ NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A., 1903
² P.'s H.E., vol. I, 218.

³ Ibid., 1905

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

besides an interesting genealogy of the family connection of the king and queen.

From this table it appears that Nub-kha-es had eleven brothers and sisters ; that she married one of her brothers, and was herself the mother of three children. The Queen's father, Sebekdudu, was the chief of the judges ; and the first of his four wives Duat-nefert, who was her mother, probably inherited royal rights and transmitted them to her daughter. The titles of Nub-kha-es show her to have been one of the great heiress princesses of whom mention is so often found in Egypt.

She was buried with great splendour of sepulchral honours, by the side of her husband in a royal tomb at Thebes. It was situated in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings, and is spoken of as a pyramid tomb. The burial place was securely sealed, and the entrance carefully hidden, that the royal occupants might sleep undisturbed for all time. After some generations had passed away, and in the XXth dynasty, thieves hunted out the secret burial place ; tunnelled a way through the protecting rock ; stole all the gold and treasure ; tore open the mummies, and, having bereft them of their jewels, wantonly set fire to their bodies, which were entirely destroyed.

News of this, and of many other tomb robberies which had been going on for years, was brought to the knowledge of Ramses IX., who ordered an investigation to be made, in order to determine the damage that had been wrought upon the royal dead. This enquiry was carried out by a special commission which examined the Pharaohs' tombs, and made an official report of all that had been brought to light, detailing the exact condition in which each tomb had been found. By a rare good fortune, these official reports still exist in two of the most interesting documents of antiquity, the Abbot¹ and Amherst Papyri.² The first of these recounts the robbery of the tomb of King Sebek-em-sauf and Queen Nub-kha-es. The Abbot Papyrus says: "It was found that the thieves had violated the tomb by undermining the chamber of the ground-level of the Pyramid, from the great exterior chamber of the sepulchre of the overseer of the granaries, Neb-Amēn, of the King Men-kheper-Ra. The place of sepulture of the king was found to be void of its occupants, so was the place of sepulture of the principal royal spouse, Nub-kha-es, his royal wife; the thieves had laid hands on them."

¹ P., R., ii, 5.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Luckily for the modern reader's interest, the Amherst Papyrus here takes up the tale of this same investigation. Eight thieves were accused of the robbery, and being "examined with blows of sticks," one of them made a confession regarding the queen's tomb.

"It was surrounded," he says, "by masonry, closed up with stones, protected by rubble, covered with slabs, but we penetrated them notwithstanding, and covered over with 'khesh-khesh' and demolished it with work, and we found it (i.e., the queen's mummy) resting likewise. We opened their coffins and their wrappings which were on them and we found this noble mummy of this king. It was found, there were two swords, and things many of amulets and necklaces of gold on his neck, his head was covered with gold upon it. The noble mummy of this king was adorned with gold throughout. Its wrappings were graven with gold and silver within and without, and

¹ B.M.; BIRCH, Papyri, vol. ii, 1-8; CHABAS, Mémoires, ii (3rd series).
MACHADO, Une Enquête, etc., 1871, R.P., xii, 106.

² NEWBERRY, Am.P., 24

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

" covered with every precious stone. We tore off the gold that we found on the noble mummy of this god, together with his amulets and necklaces, which were on his neck, and the wrappings on which they rested. We found the royal wife likewise. We tore off all that which we found from it, likewise, and we set fire to their wrappings. We took their furniture which we found with them, gold and silver and copper vases, and we divided, and we made this gold which we found upon these two gods on their noble mummies, and the amulets and the necklaces and the wrappings into eight parts."¹

One could wish that the confessing thief had stated some reason for having "burnt the noble mummies" after robbing them. Their destruction was an act of sacrilege that ill-accorded with the highly reverential language of the confession.

If the usual habit was to bury the early dynasty kings in the gorgeous state described by the Abbot Papyrus; if their mummies were "adorned with gold throughout," rolled in gold and silver embroideries, covered with golden ornaments and jewelled "with every precious stone," it is small wonder that the tombs of that age are always found rifled and empty.

A queen belonging to this period is KHENSU, "The Great Royal Wife, who is united to the Beautiful White Crown." Queen Nub-kha-es was, as we have seen, the mother of a princess Khensu, who would certainly have inherited the queen's titles. It is possible, therefore, that this heiress daughter is the same person as the Queen Khensu, who is mentioned on two scarabs, published by Petrie² and Newberry.³

Lepsius records a tomb at el Kab,⁴ in which an inscription refers to the princess Khensu, married to a prince Ai.

¹ BUDGE, H.E., vol. iii, 128-129; NEWBERRY, Am.P., 25, 27.

² P., H.Sc., 143.

³ N., Sc., xiv, 19.

⁴ L., D. Tomb, ix; LIEBLEIN, R.C., 134-5; BRUGSCH, H., 160.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

If this is the same Khensu, her title would imply the rights to which her birth entitled her, rather than her state as an actual queen.

SAT-SEBEK, "The Royal Wife," is another unknown queen whose scarabs exist,¹ and who may also be assigned to this age.

The XIIIth dynasty merges gradually into a dim period which proceeds the darkest hour, except that of its final extinction, in the history of the Egyptian Empire. There is a long list of kings' names of this time, suggesting a possible division of the double crown and two simultaneous reigns in Upper and Lower Egypt. A series of weak rulers must have exhausted the land, and prepared the way for its downfall before the foreigner. No king of all the list has left any history of his time, and there is an almost total absence of monuments or records. One or two queens appear, but only in name, as do the kings, their husbands and sons. Of these, Brugsch gives KHENSU-ANKT, connected with a king Ra-se-ankh, and NEB-HETEP-TUSAR, the wife of King Khonsu. To this time probably belongs also SENB-HENA-ES, "The Royal Wife who is united to the Beautiful White Crown." This queen is known from three scarabs, two of which, giving her the title of Royal Wife only, are in the Berlin Museum.² The third scarab, in the collection of Mr. T. M. Davis, supplies the rest of the title.³ As the White Crown was the emblem of Upper Egypt, this form probably means that the queen was the hereditary princess of the Southern half of the kingdom.

NEFERT, a Royal Wife, and mother of a princess Hatshepsut, is an unplaced queen, evidence of whom has recently been discovered by Mr. Newberry, who assigns her to the intermediate period between the close of the XIIth and the beginning of the XVIIIth dynasties

¹ In DAVIS' Coll. pub. by NEWBERRY, Sc. xii, 6. B M., No. 32,265 Nos. 9,518 and 10,977.

² Pub. NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A., 1902.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The mention of this queen's daughter is of especial interest, as it seems to be the earliest appearance of the name which queen Hatshepsut rendered famous in a later age.

For the time which follows, the records become practically a blank page, and centuries elapse before a legitimate Pharaoh again sits on the throne of his fathers. With the disappearance of the XIVth dynasty rulers. Egypt fell into the hands of the mysterious race of "Shepherd Kings," or Hyksos, who subjected the country to five hundred years of foreign rule. Many theories have been advanced to explain the origin of the Hyksos. Manetho says of them: "They were a people of ignoble race who "had the confidence to invade our country and easily "subdue it by their power without a battle. They burnt "our cities and demolished the temples of the gods, and "inflicted every kind of barbarity upon the inhabitants " . . . During the whole period of their dynasty, they "made war upon the Egyptians with the hope of exterminating the whole race. All this nation was styled Hyksos, "that is, Shepherd Kings . . . Some say they are "Arabians This people . . . retained possession of "Egypt during the period of five hundred and eleven "years."

Josephus saw in the Hyksos invasion the sojourn of the Children of Israel in Egypt. The majority of writers on the origin of these Shepherd Kings agree that they were barbaric tribes from Asia, who, first settling in small numbers in the Delta, were afterwards joined by others of their people and became strong enough to subdue with ease an already enfeebled monarchy. The names of one or two women of the houses of the Hyksos Kings survive: Tautha and Uazet appear on scarab seals as Royal Wives,

¹ In the collections of the B M.; PETRIE, UC; Davis, N's Sc., pl. xxiii, 17, xxii, 18.

For history of times, see PETRIE, HE., vol. I, 233-247; RIDGE, HE., vol. III, 133-164.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

although they can scarcely be considered as having had any connection with the heiress queens of Egypt.

During some part of the Hyksos dominion, a line of native rulers in Upper Egypt seems to have exercised a limited power as vassal kings under the foreign sovereigns. These princes, after centuries of oppression had elapsed, began to rally their forces and to fight the usurpers for the re-establishment of the legitimate monarchy.

CHAPTER V.

QUEENS OF THE XVIITH DYNASTY.

Theban. About 1700 (?) B.C.

AT some time during this period of strife, there lived a queen, TETI-SHERA, who must have been the wife of one of the first kings of the dynasty. A fine statuette in the British Museum¹ portrays this princess with the title, "Royal Mother," but she is chiefly known from the records of a later time, when, some generations after her death, a descendant, Queen Nefertari, of the XVIIIth dynasty, rebuilt the tomb of her ancestress. Teti-she^ra had originally two tombs, one at Thebes in which she was buried, and a fictitious tomb at Abydos, represented by a stela only. This representative tomb was supposed to give the spirit of its owner a resting-place in the most sacred of all cemeteries, for it was at Abydos that the principal tomb of Osiris was believed to exist.

This god, the synonym to the early Egyptians of all that was good and beautiful, once dwelt on earth and had his kingdom among men. Slain through jealousy by Set, his brother, the body was buried by his wife Isis, part of it being interred at Abydos. After a time Osiris rose from the dead, and, ascending to the heavens, there established his kingdom, and received into it the souls who had honoured him on earth. His followers desired to lie after death in the vicinity of his tomb, but since it was not possible that all should have actual burial there, it became customary to erect at Abydos tablets or stelæ to the dead, whose spirits thus obtained the right of repose near the god's earthly resting-place. The usual custom was then followed, when Teti-shera was provided with a stela tomb at Abydos.

¹ B.M., No. 22,558, pub. by BUDGE, H.E., vol. IV, 64.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

During the lapse of time the tombs of this queen had fallen into a state of neglect and ruin, so that when Nefertari and her husband wished to restore them, their actual sites were probably lost. Being forced to select a new site, they chose one next to the king's own burial place at Thebes.

A pleasant human touch is given to the story of this restoration by the Abydos stela. There it is recorded that Aahmes and his queen Nefertari were seated together one day in the palace, consulting as to what especial thing they could do to honour their ancestors. The memory of Teti-shera suddenly presenting itself to Aahmes, he discovered that her tombs had been neglected and forgotten. He straightway gave orders that two new ones should be erected to replace the old. All this was done, the stela declares, out of the king's love for his wife and his wish to honour her ancestress. The tablet was therefore placed at Abydos, and a brick pyramid with its chapel was built at Thebes, to the memory of Teti-shera. This is a unique tomb record, since the queen to whom they were reared had in the end no fewer than four tombs, the original two, and the two new ones which replaced them.¹

SEBEK-EM-SA-ES, a queen bearing full royal titles, should probably be assigned to this period, although it is impossible to state her exact place in the dynasty. She was doubtless a person of much importance in her day, since she appears as "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, the Great Royal Wife "who is joined to the Beautiful White Crown."

The latter title is found in an inscription upon the lower part of a wooden head-rest inlaid with ivory, which is now in the British Museum.² A stela in Cairo, found at Edfu, also mentions the queen's name and titles.³ A gold pendant

¹ MS. Catalogue, Cairo Museum, 115.

² No. 23,068.

³ BOURIANT, Rec., ix, 93; M.'s R.M., 625-628.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

has the double inscription, "The good god, Lord of the Two Lands, Antef, giving life," "The Great Royal Wife who is united to the Beautiful White Crown, Sebek-em-saes."¹ There were, however, five kings who bore the name Antef, and there is nothing to designate which one of them was the husband of Queen Sebek-em-saes.

Egyptologists have lately seen reason for transferring several of the Antef princes from the XIth dynasty, where they were originally placed, to the XVIIth. It is doubtless one of these later Antefs who was the husband of this queen. Further light is thrown on her by a mention in a XVIIth dynasty record, when the restoration of her tomb was ordered by Aah-hetep I.

This stela² states on the part of a priest, Au-ef, son of Art-na, that he was ordered by the queen to restore the tomb of "The Royal Daughter, Sebek-em-saes," which had fallen into ruin. On the stela the figures of the two queens are represented side by side, a fact which suggests some relationship between them. Sebek-em-saes was the older of the two queens, as the stela refers to the "restoration of her tomb, which had fallen into ruin." Queen Aah-hetep would scarcely have concerned herself about the restoration of Sebek-em-saes' tomb, nor have appeared with her on Au-ef's stela, unless the elder queen had been her ancestress.

With the XVIIth dynasty the power of the Hyksos kings in Egypt began to wane, and the arms of the native princes to wax stronger. One of these warriors, to whose prowess the kingdom owed its final restoration, was Sequenen-Ra III., whose mummy, now in the Cairo Museum, proves that he was slain in battle. His last fight had been a furious one, and it had apparently taken two axe blows and a dagger thrust in the head to crush out his brave spirit. The records of this king bring us back again to the legitimate queens of Egypt, and open the page at the beginning of the most brilliant period in their history.

¹ NEWBERRY in P.S.B.A., 1902.

² Ibid.

QUEEN AMENTEMEHYT I

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

AAH-HETEP I.

“ Divine Wife of Amen ; Royal Mother ; “ Great Royal Wife, joined to the “ Beautiful White Crown.”

The title “ Divine Wife,” was assumed by an XIth dynasty queen, Neferu ; but no other instance of its use is known prior to the time of Aah-hetep, after whom it was generally included in the preamble of the queens, and implied the rank of chief high-priestess of Amen.

The full sovereign rights seem to have been conveyed to the XVIIIth dynasty, in the person of this famous queen, whose descent may reasonably be supposed to trace from that royal heiress, the daughter, sister and wife of kings, Sebek-em-saes. It was probably through her that Aah-hetep was the heiress of the royal line of Hierakonpolis, the principality of those ancient Chiefs who first assumed the white crown as kings of Upper Egypt. The stela of Au-ef¹ proves that Queen Aah-hetep owned estates near Edfu, and that the tomb of her ancestress Sebek-em-saes was in that vicinity.

In reference to the transmission by women of the hereditary right to the Pharaoh's throne, M. Maspero says :
“ The question presents itself whether during those “ centuries of perpetual warfare (i.e., that of the Hyksos “ occupation) there had not been a moment when all the “ males of the family having perished, the women alone “ were left to perpetuate the solar race on earth, and to “ keep the succession unbroken. As soon as the veil over
“ this period of history begins to be lifted, we distinguish

¹ M.'s M.R., 625-628.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"among the personages emerging from the obscurity as "many queens as kings presiding over the destinies of "Egypt."¹

Aah-hetep was probably born during the latter troubled days of the Hyksos usurpation, when her own royal house was at war with the foreigner, for the re-establishment of the Pharaoh's lost throne. Her early years passed within sound of the clash of arms, and the alternating hopes and fears attending the victories or defeats of her warlike people. Her husband was the warrior prince, Se-quen-en-Ra III.,² whom she seems to have married when very young. Many children of this family are figured on the stelæ of two Theban officials of a later time, in such connection as to lead Egyptologists to think they were all children of Queen Aah-hetep and of Se-quen-en-Ra.

From these lists, the queen appears as the mother not only of the conqueror Aahmes, the two kings Kames and Skhent-neb-Ra, and the heiress Nefertari, but of seven other sons and daughters. The names of these princes are given as Binpu, Uazmes, Rames, and Kenaru; and the princesses as Kames, Satirbau, and Takhedka.

Se-quen-en-Ra, fighting for the freedom of his country, was slain on some distant battlefield, and his body, rescued by faithful followers, was carried home to be laid in a Theban tomb. After her husband's death, Aah-hetep saw her son Aahmes go forth to fight the hereditary foe, and to wrest from its grasp the crown of her forefathers. She must have proudly regarded him, when, returning the victorious deliverer of his Nation, he gave to his mother the royal state and rights of her inheritance; and after her stormy youth, assured to her a life of peace at last. She saw, three of her sons in turn wear the crown: Kames, Skent-neb-Ra, and Aahmes. She lived through the reign of

¹ M.'s S.N., 77.

² BOURRIANT, MASPERO, PETRIE and others hold this view, while WIEDEMANN, and BRUGSCH think she was the wife of Kames.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

her grandson Amen-hetep I., and was still alive in the time of her great-grandson Thotmes I.

Her long and checkered life witnessed Egypt's great revolution and the restoration of her royal house; and peacefully closed amid the glories of a kingdom won and firmly established by her husband, sons, grandson, and great-grandson. The evidence of the devotion paid her by her children would seem to prove her own devotion as a mother. That she in turn held the memory of her own ancestors in veneration is shown by the care with which she restored the ruined tomb of Queen Sebek-em-saes. Aah-hetep outlived her husband, her three king-sons, her daughter Nefertari, her grandson Amen-hetep I., and doubtless many others of her family. A stela dated in the tenth year of Amen-hetep I., proves that the queen was then exercising some of her royal prerogatives at the age of 88 years; a calculation which, it is claimed, rests on fixed numbers¹. A second stela of one Iufi seem to justify the supposition that the aged queen was still living early in the reign of her great-grandson Thotmes I., at which time she would have been nearly a hundred. In his reign, then, she must have died full of years and honours.

Her body was carefully embalmed, decked with the splendid jewels which the devotion of her sons had lavished, placed in a magnificent coffin, and laid away in some Theban tomb. It may have been the same as that in which, many years before, her husband had been buried, or in that of Kames. After the venerable queen's death, she was worshipped in company with her daughter Nefertari, by their descendants, who seem never to have wearied in offering devotion to the great foundresses of the dynasty.

It is to be regretted that no detailed accounts remain to make more vivid the picture of this great queen. Perhaps it was many years before Aah-hetep's tomb was violated, and its peace rudely broken, but the time came when thieves forced their way into her resting place, and dragged forth the beautiful coffin with its occupant. For some reason unknown, they did not succeed in carrying it away, but hastily thrust it under the desert sands, where it lay long forgotten. In 1860 Mariette was searching a ruined tomb, near the entrance to the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings, in a place now known as Drah abu l'Neggah. The native diggers found close by, hidden only a few feet under the sand, a fine inlaid coffin containing a mummy, which was covered with gold and jewels. This proved to be the coffin and mummy of Queen Aah-hetep.

¹ P.'s H.E., vol. II, 3, 9-13, 333.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

News of the discovery quickly travelling, the Mudir of Kenh seized the coffin and gave notice of it to the Viceroy, Said Pasha. The prompt action of the French consul at Luxor, and of M. Gabet, inspector of excavations, who at once informed Mariette, saved the wonderful "find" to the Museum. Even so, much of the treasure was lost, for although Mariette sent an imperative order that the coffin should not be opened, his demand was disregarded. The mummy of the queen was unwrapped in the harem of the Mudir's house, and the beautiful articles of jewellery were seized and dispersed. After great difficulty, Mariette succeeded in rescuing the coffin and the greater part of the jewellery, although many pieces were missing and could never be traced, and the mummy itself was destroyed.

It is said that some years later, one of the Viceroy's wives had in her possession a gold chain, more than a metre in length, which was identical with the fine workmanship of the Aah-hetep jewellery. Other tales are told of articles of gold being melted down by a native of Luxor¹

After all its vicissitudes, the coffin with its treasure at last reached the Museum, where it may be seen at the present day.² The coffin is of wood painted blue, with a massive gilt cover, carved to represent the head and face of the queen, while the body is covered from neck to feet by the great folded wings of Isis. Some of the ornaments were found on the mummy itself, while others were piled around it in the coffin; they are all made of the purest gold of a soft yellow tone, set with gems and inlaid with coloured paste; the designs and work being of great delicacy and beauty. Partly entangled in the hair of the mummy itself was a very curious diadem; this was in the form of a small golden casket, flanked by two sphinxes, with a cartouche of Aahmes, in gold laid on blue enamel.

¹ Catalogue Cairo Museum, 367-8.

² Gal. Q., Case D, No. 1251.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

A thick gold bracelet was on the arm, and fastened to the wrappings about the neck lay a beautiful golden collar made of twisted cord, and flowers of four out-spread petals, intersected with many figures of lions, antelopes, hawks, jackals, vultures and winged serpents. Two fine gold hawks' heads form the clasp. A second necklace is composed of rosettes of gold set with precious stones, while others have golden flies as pendants. One gold chain nearly a metre in length, is finished at each end with a goose head, and supports a magnificent scarab, the finest one known; it is of solid gold, ornamented with a delicate blue enamel. The collection also comprises several bracelets of gold and precious stones; besides anklets and amulets, a pectoral, the handle of a fan, a mirror, two lion heads, nine small hatchets of gold and silver, some large hatchets and daggers, and two small boats of gold and silver. Each little craft is supplied with twelve tiny rowers, pilot, helmsman, and chief officer, all made of silver.

Among the weapons is the ceremonial hatchet of King Aahmes, while several other articles have either his cartouche, or that of another one of Aah-hetep's king-sons, Kames.¹ Four alabaster canopic jars were also found with the coffin,² and a large stela exists, which contains a list of

¹ Cairo Museum, Jewel Room, Description—C.M. Catalogue, 366–385 M.'s S.N., 96–98

² Cairo M., Room C, Case C, 700.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

offerings made to Amen of Karnak, in memory of Aah-hetep. M. Maspero believes the mummy of the queen to have been stolen from its tomb by the same robbers who are mentioned in the Abbot Papyrus, near the end of the XXth dynasty ; these would have secreted the coffin in the sand until such time as they should be able to move it safely. In the meantime they were arrested, tried, and probably put to death, when the secret of their prize would die with them. At all events, the treasure lay securely hid in its shallow grave for centuries, and it was reserved for the founder of the Museum, M. Mariette, to rescue and preserve all that remained of the highly revered Queen-Mother of the XVIIIth dynasty.

CHAPTER VI.

QUEENS OF THE XVIIITH DYNASTY DOWN TO HATSHEPSUT.

XVIIIth Dynasty.

Theban. About 1580 to 1320 B.C.

THIS was in many respects the Golden Age of Egypt. Its buildings, tombs and monuments of every sort are among the finest that the kingdom ever produced. Its arts, crafts, and literature were in the zenith of their glory, and its monarchs were not only the most brilliant personalities of its history, but have so stamped themselves and their times on the countless records of the period, that, even after the lapse of more than thirty centuries, they still seem to live and appear as real human beings. The lives of many of these makers of history are so well known that it is not difficult to reconstruct with a good deal of detail a picture of XVIIIth dynasty days, with their wars and conquests, foreign relations and State policy, home lives, occupations, loves and hates.

At no period of her history was the Egyptian woman more prominent in the affairs of the realm than during this dynasty. The nature and variety of her titles form an important consideration in determining the history of the queens. An exhaustive study of these titles by a competent student would doubtless add much to our present knowledge of the actual powers and status of the royal heiresses of Egypt. An hereditary queen bore as her natural right all of the great titles: "The Royal Daughter," "Royal Sister," "Great Royal Wife," "Lady of Both Lands," "Hereditary Princess," etc., and often added the curious title, "She who is always obeyed," as well as "Ruler of all Women," and "Great Royal Wife, joined to the Beautiful White Crown."

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is difficult to determine which of these were purely hereditary and indicate an heiress-queen only. "Royal Daughter" and "Royal Sister" in most cases represented an heiress by birth. "Great Royal Wife" indicated not only a queen-consort, but was almost certainly also a title of inheritance, as it is found to have been borne by children as well as by women. The same thing is true of the priestess title, "Divine Wife."

"She who is always obeyed,"¹ is a title dating from early times, and would seem to imply an authority belonging to a reigning monarch only. So also would the title "Ruler of all Women," were it not that it is found in one of the Beni Hasan tombs, where Chenemhetep, Governor of the Oryx Nome, records his wife Sat-ap, "Hereditary Princess, Ruler of all Women."²

Neither did the title "Mistress of the Two Lands" belong exclusively to the queens, it also being found in another of the Beni Hasan tombs, that of Amenemhat, a second Governor of the Oryx Nome, whose wife Hetep was a "Priestess of Hathor" and "Mistress of the Two Lands."³ It is quite possible, however, as these two governors were great feudal princes of the realm in the XIIth dynasty, that they may have married princesses of the royal line who would have had their share of a queenly inheritance. "Lady (or Mistress) of the Two Lands" was, without doubt, a title which could also be given by courtesy, as Senseneb, the low-born mother of Thotmes I., had it.⁴

"The Great Royal Wife, joined to the Beautiful White Crown," probably indicated an heiress of the Southern part of the kingdom, the emblem of which was the white crown.

¹ NAVILLE, Z, 142; SETHE, 36, 143.

² NEWBERRY, Tombs of Beni Hasan, 82, Tomb No 14.

³ Ibid., 14, Tomb No. 2

⁴ Temple of Deir el-Bahari.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

A "Royal Mother" was simply the mother of the king's children, and might be queen, or slave, as in the case of Aset, mother of Thotmes III. Finally, nearly all the queenly titles were borne by Thuy, who, not being of royal birth, had no right whatever to them, and certainly held them only as honours conferred upon her by the King Amenhetep III, after her marriage.

There was a wide range of sacerdotal titles, implying an important religious organization, in which as many offices were filled by women as by men. These, with the exception of the highest, were by no means the exclusive property of the crown. The cult of each deity had its own sisterhood of priestesses, deriving incomes from the estates of the temples which they served; these included not only queens and princesses, but also the daughters of nobles and of priests. They were Priestesses of Hathor, Mut, or Khonsu, Chantresses, Great Players with the hand, and of the Sistrum; Great Chantress "on the day of the diurnal birth, in the women's house," etc.

There were several degrees of these religious orders: the coffin of a priest's daughter of the XXIst dynasty is inscribed in the name of "Katsashni, Superior of the 3rd rank of the Recluses of Amen." It is said that all ladies of the court were "Chantresses of Amen," a title also held by children.

Of royal rank were the Divine Wives of Amen and Mothers of the god Khonsu, while the most exalted of all, and the last one of the great titles to make its appearance, was connected with the office of "Neter tuat," or "Divine Worshipper," which carried with it the practically independent crown of Thebes. We possess little information at present on the subject of the real nature of these mysterious religious associations, with their many offices, the functions of which for the most part are unknown.

The actual state in which these ancient princesses lived was one of extraordinary luxury, as evidenced by the vast number of their personal belongings which have come down to us Their palaces were adorned with gold and painted with elaborate designs; their beds were long, graceful couches of braided palm-fibre and inlaid wood; their chairs, decorated with electrum, were low and deep-seated,¹ or plated with hammered gold, and shaped in curiously Empire-like forms² A golden chair of the Queen Sat-amen was found with a cushion of pink linen, stuffed with pigeons' feathers. A chariot of rose-tinted leather overlaid with gold; stands and work-boxes of gold and sky-blue enamel, vases, jars, and pots, of bronze, alabaster, gold, and blue or green glaze; articles of various sorts for toilet use, kohl tubes, mirrors and combs, pots for holding cosmetics and perfumes, lily-like cups of turquoise-blue faience; scarab-seals, amulets, and rings, splendid jewellery of gold and precious stones; all of these, and many more of a like nature, have come to the light of day from the tombs of a long-buried world.

AN XVIII DYNASTY PRINCESS

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The early Egyptians had a great love of flowers, and used them on all occasions. Flowers crowned their heads at festivals; lotus buds decked the princesses, queens carried bunches of lotus in ceremonials; the temples were wreathed with blossoms, which also lay thick among the offerings of the altar, guests at the feast were presented with garlands; the wine cups and dishes were adorned with flowers, and the dead were laid away covered with wreaths, many of which were destined to retain their beauty and form for thousands of years.

The art of ancient Egypt usually demanded a portrayal of the human form in its natural lines, untrammelled by draperies; hence we have the queens generally represented nude, or with only slightly indicated garments, especially in sculpture. Many pictures and other indications remain, however, which show the manner of dressing to have changed considerably from time to time. The queen seems always to have worn a large wig, in early times simply arranged, or ending in a single curl lying on the breast, the forehead encircled by a jewelled band. Later, the hair was dressed in rows of small curls, and surmounted by a head-dress formed of a uræus on the brow, with vultures' wings dependent at the sides. The gown was of white or coloured linen,¹ simple and clinging, open at the throat and ending above the ankles; or was made of a transparent stuff, a full skirt falling in many fine pleats from waist to feet; the same material, crossed over the breast and confined at the waist by a girdle tied in front, the ends reaching to the embroidered hem of the skirt. Long flowing sleeves, sandals, and a broad necklace and bracelets of gold and coloured stones, completed a costume which, as seen in the pictures of Queen Nefertari, was both graceful and elegant.

¹ Chair of Queen Hatshepsut, in B M.

² See furniture found in tomb of Inaa and Thuaa, Cairo Museum, Room T.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The gold, of which many beautiful specimens remain, was of a soft yellow tone, frequently pure and without alloy. The so-called precious stones of the jewellery consisted for the most part of turquoise, "Egyptian emeralds," lapis-lazuli, and red and white carnelian, while coloured glass and paste were much used for inlaid work.

The houses had large gardens planted with flowers, and shaded by avenues of trees, being further ornamented with ponds and small lakes, in which ducks and many kinds of fish disported themselves.

The tomb pictures show that the royal owners of all these great possessions once feasted and made merry with their people, presented gifts, watched their dances and games, and altogether conducted themselves as a happy, joy-loving people might in any age.

At the opening of the XVIIIth dynasty, the first queen to appear is the famous daughter of Se-quen-en-Ra and Aah-hetep I.

¹ WILKINSON, Ancient Egyptians.

QUEEN AHMES NEFERTARI

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

AAHMES-NEFERTARI.

“ Royal Daughter ; Royal Sister , Great
“ Royal Wife ; Royal Mother ; Divine “ Wife of Amen ; Divine Mother ;
“ Mistress of the Two Lands ; Great “ Ruler, joined to the Beautiful White
“ Crown.”

This princess is, with one exception, the most brilliant figure in the long list of Egypt's queens. Born royal heiress to the crown, she so filled her high position that her fame became even greater than that of her mother.

Divine law and human expediency having established the custom of marriages between brothers and sisters,¹ Nefertari became the wife of her brother Aahmes, the great Hyksos conqueror, for whom her vigorous character and kingly spirit made her a fit mate.

Her early youth, like that of her mother Aah-hetep, was passed in the stirring times of the great rebellion against the Hyksos. Aahmes was joint heir with her to the throne of their parents, and together they peacefully ruled the land for nearly twenty-five years.² The rock tablets of Massarah, and the caves of Turah, preserve the records of their joint reign.

On the death of Aahmes, their eldest son Amen-hetep I. assumed the crown, and with him Nefertari still continued to reign. Commenting on the active part the queen seems to have taken in affairs, M. Maspero says. “ Amen-hetep I. had not attained his majority when his ¹ NEWBERRY and GARSTANG, Hist. Eg., 127, suggest the XVIIIth dynasty for the origin of this practice; other writers consider it a more ancient custom.

² M.'s S.N., 95.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"father 'thus winged his way to Heaven,' leaving him as heir to the throne. Nefertari assumed the authority; "after having shared the honours for nearly twenty-five "years with her husband, she resolutely refused to resign "them. She was thus the first of those queens by divine "right who, scorning the inaction of the harem, took on "themselves the right to fulfil the active duties of a "sovereign."¹

Like her mother, Nefertari added to her other titles that of "Wife of Amen." This is found on a fine statue of the god² who is attended by the queen, and has the inscription, "The Divine Wife who loves him, Nefertari."

The queen's eldest son was Amen-hetep I., and the heiress-daughter bore the name of her grandmother Aah-hetep. Besides these two, afterwards monarchs of Egypt, there were several children who died young, these were the princes Sa-pa-ir and Sa-Amen; and the princesses Meryt-Amen, Sat-Amen, and Sat-kames. These children are known chiefly through their appearance with their mother on various stelæ of worship. On one occasion at least, Nefertari is represented as being piously concerned in remembering her ancestors. This is the incident of the restoration of Queen Titi-shera's tomb, recorded on the Abydos stela.³ It is probable that the monarchs had already honoured others of their ancestry, since on the stela they are considering what especial one can next be remembered, and Teti-shera, long forgotten, suddenly occurs to them. The king then undertakes the restoration out of love for his wife. In honouring Nefertari's ancestress, he also honoured his own; but it is evident from his self-effacement in the record, that he considered the mention of the heiress, Nefertari, of more importance than one of himself, although both could claim an equal lineal descent.

¹ M.'s S.N., 95.

² Cairo M.

³ See page 44.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

After her son's accession, Nefertari seems to have shared with him the active sovereign power until her death, which probably occurred early in Amen-hetep's reign. Two facts point to this conclusion: first, the Egyptologists¹ who in 1885 examined the queen's mummy, stated it to be that of a middle-aged woman, second, the earliest stelæ recording worship of the dead queen seem to occur in Amen-hetep's time.² She certainly died many years before her mother, the aged queen Aah-hetep.

The worship of Nefertari, which arose soon after her death, became a popular cult of a most unusual nature. She not only ruled her people in life, but after death still so dominated their minds as to become to them a great goddess. Her devotees elevated her to the highest heavens, where, seated by Amen, Mut and Khonsu, she was adored as a divinity equal to the persons of the sacred Theban Trinity. She was more highly revered than any of those sainted Pharaohs who had been raised to the Egyptian Pantheon. This worship of the queen and her family was more frequent and of longer duration than that of any other monarch. To her cult was attached a special priesthood, who recited in her honour the formulæ of prayers used in addressing the gods; and a large shrine sacred to the queen was borne in procession on a bark, in the same manner that the shrines of the gods were carried.

That this worship continued for some six hundred years after the queen's death, is proved by an inscription at Karnak of the XXIst dynasty, which shows King Herhor in adoration before the gods Amen, Mut, Khonsu, and Nefertari. Inscriptions of this sort are numerous and exist on many stelæ, tombs, and temples; there are more than thirty such records at Thebes, Karnak, Edfu and Abydos which can be dated; besides many other examples that are unplaced in point of time. In a few of these, Aahmes is included in the adoration of the queen, but more often she appears in company with her sons Amen-hetep and Sa-pa-ir, or with others of her children.

¹ MASPERO and BRUGSCH.

² P.'s H.E., vol. II, 3, 38.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The representations of Nefertari depict her with a black or blue skin. This puzzling detail gave rise to the theory that she was the daughter of some Southern chief of a dark-skinned race, or of negro origin ; and that Aahmes married her in order to secure her father's aid in the Egyptian struggle against the Hyksos.

On the other hand, it was explained that as the pictures of Nefertari after death represent her as a goddess, so she has also a black or blue skin, which is an attribute of Hathor and Isis, goddesses of the dead.¹

The question of her colour was set at rest, however, when in 1885 the mummy of the queen was unwrapped, and was found to be "the body of a middle-aged woman of average height, and belonging to the white race . . . of mankind."² The coffin and mummy of Queen Nefertari were found in 1881 at Deir el-Bahari, in a nameless tomb of the priestly dynasties.

The history of this great "find" of royal mummies is most interesting and extraordinary. From earliest times the royal tombs had been plundered, the mummies broken up, and the valuables carried away. In vain were cemetery guards and police appointed to protect the graves from violation ; helpless were the priests and attendants of the various tomb services ; in vain even the official enquiry of Ramses IX. into the abuses, to stop the continual and widespread plunder. The most carefully hidden tomb was sure to be hunted out and violated, until it would seem that the priests were at their wits' end to find some means of preserving the bodies of the august dead from destruction. In pursuance of this end, the royal mummies of the XVIIIth, XIXth, XXth, and XXIst dynasties, having been shifted about from one coffin and tomb to another, for the better disguise of their identity, were finally secreted in certain obscure graves of the Theban necropolis. These hiding-places were gradually forgotten, and the Pharaohs rested securely until our own day.

¹ MASPERO, BRUGSCH, LAUTH.

² M.'s Les Momies Royales de Deir el-Bahari, 635-6, BRUGSCH, Egypt under the Pharaohs, 362.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The account of their final discovery is given in the new catalogue of the Cairo Museum.

"It was in the summer of 1875 that a digger from " Sheikh abd-el-Gurnah, belonging to the family of the Abd-
" er-Rassuls, discovered one of these hiding-places. The " quantity of objects was so great and so difficult to handle,
" that the two chiefs of the family, Mohammed and Ahmed
" Abd-er-Rassul, were only able to profit by a very small " part of the windfall, just so much as they could most easily
" carry out of the ground and conceal in their house. In " the spring of 1876 a Major Campbell showed M. Maspero
" the ritual of the High-Priest Pinezem,¹ in hieratic. In " 1877, M. de Saulcy secured for the Louvre, the last pages of " a long papyrus which had belonged to Queen Nezemt, the " mother of Herhor, and the beginning of which is in Eng" land. Mariette himself had bought at Suez two other " papyri written in the name of a queen, Hent-tau. About " the same time there were offered for sale, Answerers of " King Pinezem, some good, some coarse. In short, the fact
" of a special discovery became so apparent, that in 1879,
" M. Maspero could already affirm that a certain tablet
" then belonging to Rogers Bey, and since acquired by the " Louvre Museum, must have come from a tomb near to
" the then unknown group of the tombs of the family of " Herhor; in reality it came from the hiding-place at " Deir el-Bahari, where the mummy has been found to " which it belonged. One of the principal objects of the " inspection to Upper Egypt which was undertaken by " M. Maspero in March and April, 1881, immediately after

¹ The spelling of names is altered, in uniformity with the system adopted in this book.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"he had been made for the first time, Director of the "Service des Antiquités, was to find the place where these "royal mummies were hidden. One thing only he knew by "information he had received from M. Wilbour, and that was "the names of the men who had sold the objects which had "been seen up to that time. They were, Abd-er-Rassul "Ahmed, of Sheik Abd-el-Gurnah, and Moustapha Aga "Ayad, Vice-Consul at Luxor for England and Belgium. "This latter, protected by diplomatic immunity, escaped the "pursuit, but Abd-el-Rassul was arrested on the 4th of "April."

He at first denied the charges, but after some delay, and owing to discords between himself and his brothers, he determined to reveal everything.

"He went secretly to Keneh, and made his declaration "to the Mudir, who at once referred the matter to the "Minister of the Interior. The Minister sent the telegram "to H.H. the Khedive Tewfik, who decided to send one of "the employés of the Museum to Thebes Emile Brugsch "Pasha, then Sub-conservator of the Museum, was delegated "to the work, and he set out July 1st, accompanied by "Ahmed Effendi Kamal, secretary and interpreter at the "Museum, and Tadius Moutafian, inspector of the Pyramid "district."

"On the 5th of July they were conducted to the funeral "vault by Mohammed Ahmed Abd-er-Rassul; never was "hiding-place better contrived. Between el-Assassif and "the Valley of the Queens, the chain of hills which separates "the Bab-el-Moluk from the Theban plain, forms a series "of natural amphitheatres, the best known of which had "been up to that time the one which contains the temple "of Deir el-Bahari. In the wall of rock which separates "Deir el-Bahari from the next amphitheatre, exactly behind "the knoll of Sheikh Abd-el-Gurnah and about sixty yards "above the level of the cultivated land, the old tomb- "makers had dug a shaft to a depth of 11 m. 50 cent. and

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"about 2 metres in width. At the bottom of it, in the west wall, was the entrance to a gallery which measured 1 m. 46 cent. in width and 1 m. 80 cent. in height. After running for 7 m. 40 cent., it turns abruptly to the north, and it continues for about 60 metres further; it is not everywhere of the same dimensions, but in some parts it attains a width of 2 metres, in others it is not more than 1 m. 30 cent. Towards the middle, five or six roughly hewn steps indicate a considerable change of level, and on the right side a sort of unfinished niche shows that at one time they had again thought of changing the direction of the gallery, which finally terminates in an oblong irregularly-shaped chamber about 8 metres long. The first thing that struck Brugsch's eyes was a yellow and white coffin with the name of Nebseni; it was about 60 cent. from the entrance to the gallery, a little further on was a coffin whose shape recalled the style of the XVIIth dynasty, and next came Queen Hent-tau, then Seti I. Scattered on the ground beside the coffins were boxes for the funerary statuettes, canopic jars, bronze libation vases, and quite at the end, in the angle where the corridor turned northwards, was the funeral tent of Queen Astemkheb, all twisted together like a bit of useless lumber which had been thrown carelessly aside by a priest who was in a hurry to get away. All along the great gallery there were the same disorder and the same obstructions, the advance had to be made on all fours, without any certainty as to where hands and feet should be placed. The coffins and the mummies, which were rapidly scanned by the light of a candle, were found to bear historic names, Amen-hetep I. and Thotmes II.; in the niche near the stair, Aahmes I. and his son Si-amen, Se-quen-en-Ra, Queen Aah-hetep, Aahmes Nefertari and others. The confusion was at its height in the chamber at the end, but it was easy to recognise there the predominance of the style of the XXth dynasty. The Arabs had unearthed

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"a tombful of Pharaohs! The Museum steamboat, which had been hastily summoned, had not arrived, but Reis Mohammed, one of the pilots, a man who could be trusted, was at hand. He went down the shaft and undertook to extract the contents: Émile Brugsch, Ahmed Effendi Kamal and Tadrus Moutafian received the objects as they came up, had them transported to the foot of the hill and arranged side by side, and these gentlemen never relaxed their vigilance for a moment. Forty-eight hours of hard work just sufficed to haul up the whole, but the procession had to traverse the plain of Thebes and cross the river to Luxor. Some of the coffins required from twelve to sixteen men to lift them; it took seven or eight hours to convey them from the hills to the river bank, and one can readily imagine what this meant in the heat and dust of a July day."

"At last, on the evening of the 11th, mummies and coffins, duly wrapped in mats and sheets, were deposited at Luxor. Three days after the Museum steamboat arrived, and the moment it was laden it started for Bulak with its cargo of kings! It was remarkable that between Luxor and Quft, on both sides of the Nile, the fellahin women followed it, uttering loud cries and with their hair all dishevelled, while the men fired guns as they do at funerals. The whole collection, which reached Bulak on the 20th of July, was at first laid out pell-mell, without any other classification than the size and nature of the objects. It took four years of study to ascertain what the Museum had secured. The unwrapping of the bodies was begun in the month of May, 1886, and was continued till the last days of June. Most of them were measured, inspected, described minutely, and every precaution was taken to ensure their preservation."¹

¹ Catalogue Cairo Museum. MASPERO, Translation by J. E. and A. A. QUIBELL, 393-396.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The imposing coffin in which Queen Nefertari was found is described as a large Osirian figure, in appearance "not so much that of a coffin as of one of those enormous caryatides which we sometimes find adorning the front of a temple."¹ This great figure is made of layers of cloth pasted together and stretched over a light wooden frame; the whole is thickly coated with plaster painted in yellow and blue. It represents the queen with crossed arms, each hand holding an ankh, the emblem of life. The face is apparently a portrait of Nefertari, and on the head is a formal wig surmounted by the crown and two feathers of the goddess Mut.²

The body is covered with a net-work decoration in relief, and the whole length, including the plumes, is 10 feet 4 inches. When the huge coffin was opened, it was found to contain two mummies, one of them encased in a second smaller coffin; this was at first supposed to be the mummy of the queen, but on examination it proved to be that of Ramses III. The other mummy, which was actually Nefertari, showed signs of decomposition, and was buried in the "Shuneh" of the old Bulak Museum; after a few months it was found to have lost the symptoms of decay, and was therefore in a fit state to take its place in the collection of royal mummies in the Cairo Museum.³ No jewels were found on the queen, which is the more remarkable as her mother, dying several years later, was buried in a magnificent array of golden ornaments. It may be that Nefertari was likewise honoured, but that her jewels were stolen and the wrappings afterwards restored, as in the case of so many other royal mummies.

The same crowded hiding-place in which for so long the body of Nefertari had lain, contained the mummies of several of her children, namely, Amen-hetep I., and Queen Aah-hetep II.; the young princesses Meryt-amen and Sat-

¹ M.'s S.N., 100.

² Cairo M., Gallery Q, 1, 173.

³ Gallery Q, Case C, No. 1, 173 bis.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

kames ; and the two infants Sa-amen and Sat-amen. The latter is a "false mummy," encased in a little white coffin made for a child of five or six years ; plunderers of the ancient tombs had roughly handled the small body, apparently leaving only the skull intact. When this destruction was discovered a restoration was attempted, the body being replaced by a roll of palm-leaf stems, with the child's skull at the top.¹

The case of this young princess throws light on the use of the title "Great Royal Wife." On a stela² discovered at Karnak, Sat-amen appears in a family group with her mother Nefertari, and her brothers Amen-hetep and Sapair, and bears the titles, "Royal Sister, Great Royal Wife, Divine Wife." As Sat-amen died an infant, such titles could only be hers as a birth-right, and their use proves that in certain instances this title of "Great Royal Wife" is to be interpreted as implying only a hereditary princess, and not literally a queen-consort. It has been pointed out by M. Maspero³ that Sat-amen is probably represented on the Karnak stela as the affianced wife of her brother Amen-hetep. She is also designated as "Divine Wife," another title of inheritance bequeathed by Queen Aah-hetep to her daughters and grand-daughters.

Portraits of Nefertari exist at Abydos, Karnak, Thebes, Edfu, Gurneh, Deir-el-Medineh, and on several small objects now preserved in museums. We perhaps get the best idea of the queen's features from the beautiful wooden statuettes in the Turin and Louvre Museums. She wears the winged head-dress of Mut, and the face and shoulders are modelled with great skill and distinction.

A third statuette was found by M. Legrain, in the great Karnak cachette of 1904, when a pit near the Hypostyle Hall was opened, and gave up some eight thousand five

¹ Cairo M., Gal. Q., Case Y, No 1,231. See Catalogue C.M., 440.

² M.D., 89 ; MARIETTE, CHAMPOLLION.

³ M.'s M.R., 538, 620-622.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

hundred statues, statuettes, and other objects, many of which dated from the New Empire.¹ There is also a portrait of Nefertari on the back of a statue of Amen or of Amen-hetep I. in the Cairo Museum.²

ANHAPU is another princess who should be assigned to the time of King Aahmes. She had the title of queen, and was buried in a tomb among the royal ones of Thebes, from which it may be supposed that she was of royal descent. She was the mother of a princess Hent-ta-neh,³ who is represented on two stelæ of Theban officials⁴ as among the sisters of Amen-hetep I, the children of Aahmes. It would therefore appear that Aahmes had other wives besides Nefertari, and of these Anhapu was one

She had the unusual honour of a tomb in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings. It must have been less known in later times than those of the great Pharaohs of the dynasty, for it was one of those selected by the priests as a suitable hiding-place for the royal mummies. Seti I., Ramses I., and Ramses II., were thus removed from the tomb of the former to that of Queen Anhapu, where they lay until it was believed they were again in danger, when they were taken to the tomb of Amen-hetep I. Eventually all of these mummies, including that of Anhapu herself, were securely hidden in the Deir el-Bahari tomb which gave up so many royal dead when it was opened in 1881. Memoranda of these various removals were written in hieratic on the mummy wrappings.

The mummy of Queen Anhapu was in a good state of preservation and still had about the neck a garland of flowers. A band of metal and precious stones had encircled the head; this had left a deep imprint in the bandages, but the jewelled ornament itself had disappeared.

¹ On exhibition in the Cairo Museum. Arch. Report, E. Ex. F, 1904-5.

² Room C, 698.

³ CHAMPOLLION, N 513; L., D., iii, 8a; M.'s M R., 622.

⁴ L., D., iii, 2d; 2a.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The mummy is of an unusual length, 1 m. 85 cent., which of all the royal mummies is only equalled by that of King Se-quen-en-Ra, and exceeds by 5 centimetres the mummy of Ramses the Great.

On being unwrapped it was found to retain evidence of what in life must have been great beauty · a low forehead, straight nose, fine hair, large eyes and long curling lashes. The sound white teeth indicated about forty years of age. M. Maspero says of Anhapu : " Her type closely resembles " that of the Berberines, or of the beautiful fellahin women " of the Said."¹

The body of the queen was not found in a coffin of her own, but in that of a certain lady Rai, according to its inscriptions, the nurse of Queen Nefertari. The lady Rai herself had disappeared, and her coffin had in ancient times been appropriated for Anhapu, whose own coffin had probably been destroyed in one of the many transits from place to place of the royal mummies. In Rai's coffin, therefore, surrounded by inscriptions and prayers on Rai's behalf, Anhapu now lies. The case is painted green and decorated with yellow stripes.²

For many years after the finding of the royal mummies, all those in good condition were exposed to view in the Cairo Museum. In 1907 the Director thought best to shut away from sight many of the royal dead ; the fine mummy of Anhapu, therefore, together with several others of the Egyptian queens, are no longer to be seen.

THENT-HAPI was another wife of the king Aahmes. She was a " royal daughter " and possibly also a queen, as her daughter Hent-tamehu had regal titles.³

¹ MASPERO, Momies Royales de D  ir el Bahari, 530-533

² Cairo M., Gallery Q, Case A, No. 1,215.

³ M.'s M.R., 530-534 ; Slab in F.P. Coll.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

AAH-HETEP II.

"Royal Daughter; Royal Sister; Royal
"Mother; Lady of both Lands; Great
"Royal Wife, who is united to the Crown;
"Divine Wife of Amen."

This queen was the daughter of Aahmes and Nefertari. She, as well as her mother, must have been brought up under the influence of her grandmother, Queen Aah-hetep, for whom she was named. Like both of those famous queens, her "solar" descent was pure and unmixed. She married her brother Amen-hetep I, and her daughter Aahmes thus became the hereditary princess.

Her other children were two sons, Amenmes and Uazmes, mentioned in the tomb of Paheri at El Kab. Traces of a second daughter, Nebta, are found on a scarab.¹ One of her sons seems to have lived long enough to be for a time associated with his father in the government.

No details of the life of Aah-hetep II. are known. On several monuments² she is represented by her husband's side, and the full royal titles are given on her coffin.³ This was also among those found at Deir el-Bahari, and is a colossal case like that of Nefertari.⁴ When opened it contained a mummy wrapped in a beautiful orange linen shroud. It was at first thought to be that of the queen, until examination proved it the body of the Pharaoh Pinczem I.

It is difficult to account for the construction of enormous coffins like those of Nefertari and Aah-hetep II. If the idea was to enclose in the great outer figure several other cases graduated in size, the arrangement certainly did not add to the security of the occupant, since the body of Aah-

¹ LEPSIUS, Königsbuch, 328.

² Pub. by WIEDEMANN, A.G., 316, 317.

³ Cairo M., Gallery Q, Case A, 1,172.

⁴ Ibid., 1,173.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

hetep has entirely disappeared. The position of her tomb is unknown. Her name is occasionally found on scarabs.

To the family of Amen-hetep I., three other queens, his sisters, should be added. The first of these is.

MERYT-AMEN, daughter of Aahmes and of Nefertari. Her titles,¹ "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Great Lady of both Lands, Great Royal Wife, Divine Wife," show her position as hereditary princess, and probably also as consort of the reigning king. In the temple at Deir-el-Medineh, and on other monuments, Meryt-Amen accompanies her mother and her brother Amen-hetep I. She was probably the spouse of this king, and from her position in the tablets of the worship of this family, she seems to have died young.² It is possible that Meryt-Amen was the eldest and therefore the chief heiress daughter of Nefertari, and that she ranked as Amen-hetep's first queen. Officials attached to her household have left memorials of her service,³ and her name occurs on several scarabs,⁴ one of which is inscribed, "The domain of Meryt-Amen."

A mummy wrapped in a shroud which was stamped with the name and titles of Meryt-Amen was in the Deir el-Bahari cachette, and was supposed to be the body of that princess. When it was unwrapped, however, a nameless mummy was found, which, from its appearance, was believed to be of the XIIth or XIIIth dynasty.⁵ The older mummy had evidently been substituted for that of Queen Meryt-Amen, which had disappeared. Another queen of Amen-hetep I. was SAT-KAMES, "the Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Chief Royal Wife, Great Lady, Divine Wife."⁶ Like

¹ M.'s M.R., 539, 617.

² M.'s M.R., 623.

³ Fragment F.P. Coll., P.'s H.E., vol. II, 44; Cone of priest, M.A.F., viii, 299, 72.

⁴ B.M., Louvre M., F.P. Coll., W. Coll., pub. NEWBERRY, Sc. xxvi, 19, 20, 21, 22.

⁵ Cairo M., Room R, Case H, No. 1, 191; M.'s M.R., 539.

⁶ Livres des Rois, BRUGSCH and BOURIANT; M.'s M.R., 541, 620-623

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Meryt-Amen, her appearance in the family groups of Nefer-tari and her children show the princess to have been the daughter of that queen and of King Aahmes

Examination of the mummy of Sat-kames proved that she was about thirty years of age at the time of her death. It is, therefore, almost certain that in her case the title of "Royal Wife" was not simply one of heredity, but signified her actual position as spouse of the king. No children of these two queens are known, which possibly accounts for their apparent inferiority of rank to that of their sister, Aah-hetep II. That princess figures conspicuously as Amen-hetep's queen-consort and the mother of the throne's heiress.

The mummy of Sat-kames, adorned with garlands,¹ was found in the coffin of a "Chantress of Amen" of the XXth dynasty. The queen had been despoiled of her ornaments by ancient robbers, and the body had been re-wrapped in its original bandages. The jewels, which had left their impression on the skin, seem to have been very rich; they included a diadem, a necklace of four rows of gems, and bracelets of metal and precious stones. The thieves had detached these various articles by means of a hatchet or knife, and had mutilated the mummy in their haste to tear from it the golden ornaments.

The queen Sat-kames had been of good figure, well developed, with straight fine features, white skin, dark chestnut hair, fine and waving, small hands, with tapering fingers, of which the nails had been tinted with henna.² On the wrappings was written, "Year seven, month four of first season, day eight; a place was given to the Royal Daughter, the Great Royal Wife, Aahmes Sat-kames, justified."

The mummy is enclosed in a covered coffin in the Cairo Museum.³ She is named with her father Aahmes I. on a scarab in the Louvre.⁴

¹ Cairo M., Room R, Case A.

² M.'s M.R., 540-543.

³ Room R, Case A.

⁴ N., Sc. xxvi, 17

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

HENT-TAMEHU is a third princess, who with her half-sisters, Meryt-Amen and Sat-kames, may have enjoyed the rank of queen of Amen-hetep I. She was the child of Aahmes and of the "Royal Daughter, Thent-hapi." Her mummy, found with the other members of this family at Deir el-Bahari, was black and in a good state of preservation, although it had been badly prepared. It was enclosed in a white coffin without inscription.¹ On the upper part of the shroud was written in hieratic the name and titles of the "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Royal Spouse, Hent-tamehu, born of the Royal Daughter Thent-hapi."

Hent-tamehu was, therefore, either the wife of her brother Amen-hetep, or bore her titles as a hereditary princess.

TURS is the name of another one of the many queens of this family whose exact position is unknown. From her appearance in the family groups of King Aahmes, she was doubtless one of his daughters, and a sister of Amen-hetep I. She was of full royal birth, her titles being, "Royal Wife, Great Lady of both Lands."²

SENSENEB, although the mother of a king, the son and successor of Amen-hetep I., was neither a queen nor princess of the royal line. She seems to have been a daughter of the people, taken into the Pharaonic house to become the slave of Amen-hetep.³

No son of any one of Amen-hetep's queens surviving to assume the crown, it remained for the son of the low-born Senseneb to ascend the throne of Egypt, after his father's death. Senseneb was only raised to royal honours by her son Thotmes, who ennobled her in his accession announcement. An ostrakon now in the Cairo Museum, after proclaiming Thotmes I. to the Prince of Elephantine, proceeds, "Then cause the oath to be taken in the name of

¹ Cairo M., Room R, Case C, No. 1,186 ; M.'s M.R., 543.

² L., D., iii, 2, a d. ; M.'s M.R.

³ M.'s S.N., 104, 105.

QUEEN AAHMES

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

my Majesty, born of the Royal Mother Senseneb, who is in good health."¹

After this, she may be supposed to have enjoyed the state and, at least formerly, the position of a queen. On the walls of the temple at Deir el-Bahari her portrait shows a youthful woman with full rounded lines, and a face of great charm. Above the figure her name is enclosed in a royal oval, and she is given by courtesy the title, "Lady of both Lands."

AAHMES

"Hereditary Princess, Great Lady of both
"Lands, Royal Sister, Great Royal Wife,
"Divine Wife."

To this queen passed the full sovereign rights inherited through both parents, Aah-hetep II. and Amen-hetep I. Her own brothers had died young, and when the time came for choosing a husband to share the royal heiress's throne, the selection fell on Amen-hetep's young son Thotmes, the child of Senseneb. To this prince, although his birth was but half royal, Aahmes was united, and, chiefly through her rights, Thotmes became King of Egypt.

Although Aahmes held unquestioned rights of priority over her half-brother, she seems to have yielded entirely to him the government of her kingdom. She apparently inherited no love of power from her grandmother, Nefertari, or possibly she renounced her sovereignty though a voluntary act of affection to Thotmes, who, from whatever cause, assumed the crown as though he were its sole inheritor. Aahmes seems to have married her half-brother before their father's death. Her chief claim to renown is that she was the mother of the most famous of Egypt's queens, Hatshepsut. It is to the filial devotion of this daughter that we owe the beautiful portraits of Aahmes which are carved and painted in the temple at Deir el-Bahari ; one of these is accompanied by an inscription in which the god Thoth describes the queen to Amen, and says, " Aahmes is her name, she is more beautiful than any woman " ¹

¹ ERMAN, Z.A., xxix, 116, 117.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

More than three thousand years have passed since the gracious image was fixed on the temple walls, and still the sweetness of her smile looks out from the crumbling stones, and gives one warm human touch to the silent ruins about her.

Besides Hatshepsut, Aahmes had one other daughter, Khebt-neferu, who died young ; she is represented as a child in her sister's temple.² Of small objects naming Queen Aahmes, there remain some scarabs ;³ a curious ivory wand formed of a curved arm and hand,⁴ a vase presented by her daughter,⁵ and an alabaster statuette in the Cairo Museum.

MUT-NEFERT.

" Royal Daughter, Royal Wife, Royal Mother."

These titles are found on a portrait statue of this queen, and on one of her son at Karnak. She was a second wife and queen of Thotmes I. and the mother of Thotmes II. It is not so clear whose daughter she was, although she was possibly a half-sister of Thotmes and Aahmes, with the same father. Her mother, whose name is unknown, was

¹ NAVILLE, Tomb of Hatshepsut, 2.

² L., D., iii, 86 ; L., K., xxiv, 342 ; ROSELLINI, Monumenti Storici, vol. I, 215, 216 ; M.'s M.R., 633-637.

³ B.M. ; Louvre M.

⁴ Turin M.

⁵ BREASTED, Records, 87.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

probably not of the royal house,¹ or was one of the many secondary wives of Amen-hetep I.

The portrait statue of Mut-nefert, now in the Cairo Museum, was found in the ruined chapel of Uazmes near the Ramesseum at Gurnah.² The figure, of painted limestone, is seated and wears a clinging white robe, and the conventional heavy wig. The skin is painted yellow, and the face is mutilated.

The statue is not in the best art of the period; it was erected to the memory of the queen by her son Thotmes, and bears the inscription, "The good god, Lord of Both "Lands Aa-kheperu-Ra (Thotmes II.) made by him, his "monuments of his mother, Royal Wife, Royal Mother "Mut-nefert makheru."

With this statue were found fragments of five or six similar figures, which must have stood together. The fact that these were erected in the chapel of Uazmes, seems to show some particularly close connection between that prince and Mut-nefert. According to Petrie's interpretation of this family, Uazmes must have been her half-brother.³ She may even have been his wife, before her marriage with Thotmes.

THE THOTMES FAMILY.

Queen Aah-hetep II. = Amen-hetep I. = Senseneb (not royal), Queen Aahmes = Thotmes I. = Mut-nefert.

Queen Hatshepsut = Thotmes II. = Aset (a slave).

Meryt-Ra = Thotmes III.

We now arrive at one of the disputed points in the history of the XVIIIth dynasty, namely, the relationships of the Thotmes family of kings. Countless are the records

¹ M.'s S.N., 236, 237; P.'s H.E., vol. II, 71.

² Found in 1881 by GRÉBAUT. Cairo M., Room M, No. 319. MARIETTE and BRUGSCH thought this queen a daughter of Thotmes II.

³ P.'s H.E., vol. II, 52.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

existing on monuments, temple walls, tombs, commemorative stelæ, statues, papyri, etc., concerning the various acts and personages of the great ruling family of the dynasty.

From this mass of evidence, various histories have been reconstructed of these kings. The most generally accepted one affirms that Thotmes I. was the father of Thotmes II. and of Queen Hatshepsut, whom he associated with himself in the government; that Hatshepsut then married her brother Thotmes II., with whom she reigned until his death, after which she declared co-regent with herself a young prince Thotmes, afterwards Thotmes III.

The evidence concerning the place of this third Thotmes in the family is contradictory. One statue calls him the brother of Hatshepsut, while a second statue, together with a tomb inscription, refer to him as the son of Thotmes II. His mother was a woman of low birth, named Aset. The simplest explanation would seem to be that this son, born of a slave mother, was the only surviving heir of Thotmes II.

It is certain that in the many monuments still existing from that age, we have evidence of three different Thotmes; and that from their midst looms the commanding figure of one woman, a dominating personality that fills the scene and reveals to modern eyes the most brilliant and interesting of the queens of antiquity.

CHAPTER VII.

THE DAUGHTER OF THOTMES I.

HATSHEPSUT.

" King of the North and South, Ka-Ma-
 " Ra, Son of the Sun, KHNUM-AMEN-
 " HATSHEPSUT. The Horus of Gold ;
 " Bestower of years ; Goddess of risings ;
 " Conqueror of all Lands ; Lady of both " Lands ; Vivifier of hearts ; Chief
 " Spouse of Amen ; The Mighty
 " One."

SUCH were the stately titles assumed by this remarkable princess when she ascended the throne of her fathers, titles which were never before or after taken by a woman.

The Princess Hatshepsut was the heiress daughter of Thotmes I. and of Queen Aahmes. If she ever had brothers of her own, they had died as children, as had also her elder sister, Khebit-neferu. This left the young Hatshepsut sole heiress, with no one but a half-brother to claim a share of the crown. The youthful prince, Thotmes II., was the son of Thotmes I. by a mother of only half royal lineage, Mut-nefert. To this half-brother, Hatshepsut was united. The marriage of Thotmes to his strong-minded sister, who was destined to overshadow him completely in later years, occurred either just before or just after the death of their father Thotmes I. Shortly before this event, the king associated his daughter with himself in the government of the kingdom.¹

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The coronation ceremonies took place a few weeks later, and the joint reign of Hatshepsut and Thotmes II. appears to have lasted about thirteen years.² There is little doubt that Hatshepsut, with her stronger character, had the management of the kingdom chiefly in her own hands, even during the lifetime of her husband.

No son was born of this union, their family consisting of two daughters only, Neferu-Ra, and Meryt-Ra. Some thirteen years after his accession, Thotmes II. died, leaving his consort the great ruler of Egypt. The claim of Thotmes III. to a share of the crown was an undeniable one, or the queen would never have consented to associate with her reign a man who was the son of a slave, nor would she have united to him her heiress daughter. Thotmes was, however, proclaimed joint sovereign, and his marriage with the queen's young daughter took place.

He was probably a mere youth at the time, and Hatshepsut constituted herself practically sole monarch of the kingdom, and held the reins of government, it may be presumed, until the day of her death.

Her own reign is entirely overlapped by those of her co-regents, Thotmes I., II., III.; and it may have been for this reason that the Pharaohs of the Ramesside family, two hundred years later, did not regard her as a legitimate monarch. Nevertheless, her rule was so vigorous a one, that not only her husband's reign, but also the early years of the nephew who afterwards became so great a king, are quite submerged in the brilliant reign of the queen.

Much has been said of the "usurpation" of the throne by Hatshepsut, and of the illegal treatment of her nephew; these accusations hardly seem justified, however, when the facts are recalled. Hatshepsut was by birth the rightful heiress, and, according to Egyptian law, had precedence of the male members of the family. Her abilities had been so pronounced, that her father had raised her to the throne while she was still very young. She was many years older than her nephew, and exercised only her legitimate prerogatives when she declined to lay down the sceptre in favour of a mere youth, who was, moreover, not of full royal birth.

¹ Noted by de ROUGÉ, later proved by NAVILLE'S excavation of Temple of Deir el-Bahari.

² P.'s H.E., vol. II, 75, 79.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Neither does it seem reasonable to suppose that Thotmes himself could have resented her rule as bitterly as he is said to have done; he would, of course, be aware of all these facts, and must have realised that his aunt, even if not following precedent in thus claiming sole control of the government, was at least within her own rights. Hatshepsut had indeed ascended the throne of her fathers as its unquestioned inheritor. The high lineage of "solar blood" had been bequeathed her by her mother Queen Aahmes, who was the daughter of Amen-hetep I. and Aah-hetep II.; and the grand-daughter of the famous Nefertari. On her mother's side, therefore, there was no trace of blemish; but this was not the case with Hatshepsut's father, Thotmes I., whose mother Senseneb was a woman of humble origin, (See table, page 53.)

The high spirit of the queen could in no wise brook the thought of this plebeian blood in her veins, and upon her accession to power she set herself to remedy the defect.

Entirely undaunted by the facts of the matter, this able princess had recourse to a miracle, the details of which she proclaimed and perhaps herself believed; at all events, she recorded it on the walls of her great temple at Deir el-Bahari, and there is even evidence which shows that it was accepted by her people as divine truth. A recognition of her claim occurs in the inscription of a contemporary official, who declares that "Egypt bowed its head before this blessed offspring of the god, sprung from his loins."¹

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The miracle set forth by Hatshepsut concerned the god Amen, who, pondering on the mixed marriages of his children, the Egyptian monarchs, which had lessened their royal claims, determined to restore the race and purify the solar line by creating a child of his own, who should be born of the queen-mother Aahmes.

The story of her miraculous birth and early life are related in minute detail by the sculptures of the queen's temple. Amen, becoming incarnate in the person of Hatshepsut's earthly father, Thotmes I., appeared to Aahmes "in a flood of light and perfume." The royal daughter of the god was born in due time, provided by the gods with several Kas, or ghostly doubles of herself, and received the name of Hatshepsut.

She was then presented to Amen and Horus, who baptized her, pouring water over her head and saying, "Thou art pure as thy double." Amen then embraced his daughter and gave her the emblems of sovereignty.

After this, the princess, accompanied by her father Thotmes, started on a journey to the various sanctuaries of the land, by which ceremony she symbolically took possession of her kingdom. Hatshepsut's description of herself at this period is as follows:

"It came to pass that her Majesty was increased above
"all things, beautiful to look at above all things, her voice
"was that of a god, her frame was that of a god, she did "everything like a god, her spirit was like a god. It came "to pass that her Majesty was a beautiful maiden. . . .
"Her Majesty started for the land of the North, following "her father, the king of Upper and Lower Egypt, Aah-
"kheper-ka-Ra, living eternally. She went to her mother
"Hathor, the princess of Thebes; Buto, the lady of Tep;
"Amen, the lord of the thrones of the two lands; Tum,

¹ Inscription of Anna.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

" the lord of Heliopolis ; Menthu, the lord of Thebes ;
" Khnum, the lord of Elephantine ; the chief of all the gods
" of Thebes, and to all the gods of the North and South.
" They were well pleased with her."¹

On this journey, the queen made offerings to the temples, and erected statues and altars ; restoring, moreover, much that had fallen into ruin. Her record proceeds : " Thou restorest what was decaying, thou raisest thy statues in thy temples, thou enrichest the altars of him who begot thee, thou goest on the plains, and thouexplorest mountains in great number ; thou strikest with thy sword . . . thy tributes are men by millions, prisoners of thy sword . . . thou bringest offerings to Thebes, to the staircase of the king Amen-Ra."²

At this point in the life of Hatshepsut, her father Thotmes takes up the account,³ and records her association in his government with the throne name of Ka-ma-ra. The queen's own representations of her enthronement portray her as a youth standing before Thotmes, who says : " Come thou blessed one, whom I take in my arms, that thou mayest see thy directions (carried out) in the palace ; thy doubles (thy person) are made very precious. Thou hast received the investiture of the double crown, thou art blessed by thy magic power, thou art mighty by thy valour, thou art powerful in the two lands. . . . When thou risest in the palace, thy brow is adorned with the double crown united on thy head, for thou art my heir "⁴

Then to the assembled multitude of nobles and officers the king said . " This daughter Khnumit Amen Hâtshopsîtû, the loving one, I put her in my place . . . henceforth she guides you, listen to her words and submit unanimously to her commands. Whoever adores her, he will live ; but he who speaks evil against her Majesty, he will die."⁵

¹ Temple Deir el-Bahari, NAVILLE, Tomb of Hâtshopsîtû, 4, 5.

² Ibid.

³ Karnak, Pylon of Thotmes I.

⁴ NAVILLE, Tomb of Hâtshopsîtû, 9, 10

⁵ Ibid.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The full names of the young sovereign were then settled, and stood : "The Horus, mighty by his Kas, the Lord of "East and West abounding in years, the good goddess, the "pious Lady, the golden falcon divine in her risings, the "King of Upper and Lower Egypt, Ka-ma-ra, the daughter "of Ra, Khnumit Amen Hâtshopsitû."¹

Her accession to the regal authority, and the relative positions on the throne of the queen and her husband Thotmes II., are commented on by an official of that period, Anna, who says : "When his Majesty (Thotmes I.) appearing in heaven, rejoined the gods, though his son (Thotmes "II.) standing in his place (inheriting his claim) as king of "the country, reigned on the throne of him who had given "him birth, his sister, the divine wife Hatshepsut, acted as "master of the country ; the kingdom was subject to her "will : Egypt bowed its head before this blessed offspring "of the god, sprung from his loins."²

In ceremonies, the queen nevertheless seems to have occupied a secondary place during her husband's life, as appears from some bas-reliefs at Karnak.³ In these pictures, Thotmes II. makes offering to the gods, while Hatshepsut, clothed as a woman, stands behind him. In the Karnak fragments she frequently bears the title of queen, which, as M. Naville points out, never occurs in her own temple of Deir el-Bahari.⁴

Consistent with the arrangement which secured the divine claim unblemished to Hatshepsut, she never thereafter failed to express devotion to her father Amen, and to assert direct inspiration for the principal acts of her reign. She appears to have considered a manly dress more expressive of authority than a woman's, and caused herself to be sculptured with all the attributes of a king. She is represented in male attire, with a beard attached to her chin, and is referred to in inscriptions by the masculine pronoun.

¹ NAVILLE, T H, 12, 22.

² Ibid.

³ Recently discovered by LEGRAIN.

⁴ N., T H, 15.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The chief undertaking of Hatshepsut's reign was the famous expedition to the foreign land of Punt, and the most important work was her great temple, on the walls of which the story of the expedition is faithfully set forth. The foundation deposits of the temple are in the name of Hatshepsut ; and M. Naville, who attributes the building to the queen alone, thinks it was probably begun immediately after the death of her husband, Thotmes II.

This temple was considered an entirely unique and original piece of architecture, until in 1904, M. Naville discovered its prototype in a long-hidden temple of the king Mentuhetep III., some seven or eight centuries earlier. This is situated close by Hatshepsut's building, which probably copied the earlier one ; but in spite of its lack of originality, the temple of the queen still remains one of the most beautiful and interesting monuments of ancient Egypt.

It is built at the base of the rugged Theban cliffs, and commands the plain in magnificent fashion ; its white colonnades rising, terrace above terrace, until it is backed by the golden living rock. The ivory white walls of courts, side chambers and colonnades, have polished surfaces which give an alabaster-like effect. They are carved with a fine art, figures and hieroglyphs being filled in with rich yellow colour, the glow of which against the white gives an effect of warmth and beauty quite indescribable. The spirited art of these wall pictures, the bold freedom of drawing, precision of finish and wealth of portraiture, place them among the most remarkable sculptures of their kind.

A great avenue, bordered with crouching sphinxes, led up to the temple entrance, each sphinx's head being a portrait of the queen. It is on the walls of this stately edifice that Hatshepsut has carved the chief records of her life ; the supposed circumstances attending her birth ; her presentation to the people as royal heir ; her assumption of power ; and above all, the story of the great Punt expedition.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The Land of Punt has by modern writers been located on the Somali coast. To the ancient Egyptians it was a mysterious country, visited in early times by their forefathers ; but in the days of Hatshepsut the knowledge of its position had been lost ; only a general notion remaining to the effect that " it lay to the South, or the extreme East. "From thence many of the gods had come into Egypt, "while from out of it, the sun rose anew every morning."¹ It was, moreover, a country rich in that aromatic gum, which, used as incense, was an offering particularly acceptable to Amen ; indeed, it was by Amen's express command that his daughter undertook the expedition to this unknown country.

The god, promising to lead the Majesty of Hatshepsut to the " Ladders of incense," adds that, " It is a secret Land, in "truth a place of delight," to which he would lead them "by land and by water, on mysterious shores which join "the harbours of incense, the sacred territory of the divine "land."

In obedience to Amen's counsel, the queen immediately fitted out five great galleys, and stocked them with various Egyptian products to be used for barter with the people of Punt. The fleet sailed forth under a royal envoy, and in time reached a marvellous country, where the desired incense trees grew in abundance ; also the land was rich with palms, strange plants and ebony trees ; and abounded with gold, ivory, spices, and curious beasts. The huts of the people were built on piles as a protection against wild animals, and the inhabitants were forced to climb into their abodes by means of ladders. The native people were of a light-skinned race resembling the Egyptians, and they received the travellers with kindly interest.

The Prince of Punt came out to meet Hatshepsut's ambassador, and a friendly exchange of compliments and merchandise took place; after which the vessels were loaded with the Punt products, and departed for home. It is supposed that about two years had elapsed since the sailing of the expedition, before the five galleys, triumphantly returning, laid their spoils at Hatshepsut's feet. The treasure consisted of ivory tusks, gold, ebony, cassia, myrrh, cynocephalus apes, green monkeys, greyhounds and leopards; besides skins, oxen, giraffes, slaves, plants and fruits; and most precious of all, the incense trees, thirty-one in number, with their roots protected by balls of earth fitted into tubs. The trees were planted in the garden of the temple at Thebes, where they grew and flourished and provided abundance of fresh incense for the service of Amen.

¹ M.'s S.N., 246.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

At Deir el-Bahari, the remains of several trees, palms and perseas have been found in pits dug in the rock;¹ these are situated on both sides of the slope which gave access to the temple, and doubtless represent its garden. At the end of one of the avenues leading to the temple are the ruins of a building which M. Naville suggests may have been a palace of the queen.²

An inscription of the year IX of this reign, refers to the planting of the incense trees in the garden of Amen, and adds "Punt had been transported to Thebes." The great expedition had therefore taken place previous to the queen's ninth year, and was perhaps one of her first achievements.

All of its history is told with minute detail on the upper terrace wall, in a series of vivid pictures with explanatory text. In the last of these the queen, having received the cargoes of the five ships, presents the whole to her father Amen; and an account of the gifts is taken by Thoth, scribe of the gods. A mutilated record on the lower terrace represents the queen as a human-headed lion tearing her enemies; from which it would appear that she had engaged in wars, commemorated in this scene. The picture has been almost entirely hammered out by some one who wished to obliterate the memorial, and its real significance is lost.

¹ NAVILLE, T.H., 64, 59.

² Ibid.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

For the most part, her years seem to have passed in prosperity and peace; the sovereign was entirely occupied with the internal affairs of the kingdom, and no record remains which suggests that she impoverished the treasury or sacrificed her people in the prosecution of wars. If in the end the empire lost some of its Asiatic provinces by this peaceful policy, the land of Egypt was certainly the better for it; since the long period of peace was employed in developing its resources, adding to its buildings and restoring its ruins.

The whole valley of the Nile bears witness to the industry of this reign. In the great temple of Amen at Karnak, Hatshepsut not only added sculptures to several side chambers, but chose this site for the erection of her two obelisks. The larger one of these commemorated the "Sed festival," which occurred in the sixteenth year of her reign. In planning these obelisks, Hatshepsut, as usual, asserts devotion to her divine father Amen as the leading motive: "I make this known," declares the queen, "to the generations which are to come, whose hearts will enquire after this monument which I have made for my father, and who will talk enquiringly and gaze upon it in future: 'I sat in the palace and thought upon him who created me, and my heart prompted me to raise to him two obelisks of electrum, whose apices should pierce the firmaments, before the noble gate-way between the two pylons of Thotmes I. . . Beware of saying, 'I know not, I know not, why it was resolved to carve this mountain wholly of gold.' These two obelisks, my Majesty has made them of electrum for my father Amen, that my name may remain and live on in this temple for ever and ever."¹

¹ LEPAGE-RENOUF, R.P., XII, 133-135; M.'s S.N., 244.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The description of the obelisks as "mountains wholly of gold" is only the usual Pharaonic exaggeration always found in the laudatory accounts of their own works. The lower terrace of the queen's temple has a representation of the transport of the obelisks from Elephantine. They were placed on a barge and towed by thirty boats with crews of more than a thousand men down the river to Thebes. Only seven months' time was required for the quarrying, inscribing, transportation, and erection of the great monoliths. The tops were gilded, and the towering shafts of polished rose granite must have been beautiful indeed, when, rising above the temple buildings, "their brilliancy lit up the two lands of Egypt."

The greater of these two obelisks is 97½ feet in height, and when its metal top caught the sunlight, it would have been a glittering spot in the clear atmosphere, visible from every direction for many miles. It is still standing, the finest obelisk in Egypt, although the gilded covering of the apex has long since disappeared.¹

In all of the queen's works, she had the services of a great architect, Senmut by name, who was one of the most important figures of his time. He built temples for her Majesty, and erected the obelisks at Thebes; he was the queen's royal seal-bearer and chief tutor to her children. On his stela at Aswan he stands before Hatshepsut, and is styled, "the companion greatly beloved, keeper of the palace, "keeper of the heart of the queen, making content the Lady "of both lands, making all things come to pass for the spirits "of her Majesty."

Hatshepsut's building achievements in Egypt were not her only enterprises. She caused the reopening of the ancient mines of Sinai, and obtained from thence a quantity of the green stones used in decoration and in jewellery. The officer sent to accomplish this mission also restored a temple of Hathor in the distant land.

¹ The only taller obelisk in existence is in Rome, before the church of S. Giovanni Laterano. It was erected in Thebes by Thotmes III.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The length of the queen's reign cannot be stated exactly, nor the date of her death. Considering the force of her character and the firm hand with which she held the sceptre, it is only reasonable to suppose that she never relinquished it in life.¹ In the remains of her buildings at Karnak, mention is made of the seventeenth year. This was the latest date known of her reign, until Mr. Petrie found at Sinai a stela set up at the shrine of Hathor, dated in the twentieth year of Hatshepsut and Thotmes III.

Among the last works of the queen was a rock shrine in Middle Egypt, an important monument now known as the "Speos Artemidos." The sanctuary was excavated from the rock, and entered by a vestibule with eight columns. It was dedicated to the lion-headed goddess Pacht, and has above the entrance a long inscription, in which the queen recapitulates the chief events of her reign.

In her greatest memorial, the Memnonium at Deir el-Bahari, she apparently wrote down the events of her life as they occurred. M. Naville says,² "It was like an open book, in which was inscribed during the queen's lifetime all she wished to hand down to posterity." The building, or at least the decoration of it, was left unfinished at her death. All the members of the queen's family accompany her in this splendid monument, which she raised to perpetuate her memory; her grandmother Senseneb, her father Thotmes I., her husband Thotmes II., and Khebt-neferu, Neferura, and Thotmes III., her sister, daughter, and nephew.

The only instance in Egyptian annals of the personal description of a woman given by herself is in the case of Hatshepsut, who uses no measured terms:³ "His Majesty himself put with her own hands oil of ani on all her limbs. Her fragrance was like a divine breath, her scent reached as far as the land of Punt; her skin is made of gold, it

* ¹ ERMAN thought she might have been deposed by Thotmes III.

² N., T.H., 57.

³ Temple Deir el-Bahari, N., T.H., 39.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"shines like the stars in the hall of festival, in the view of "the whole land. . . . They celebrate Kamara, in her divine
"doings, as she is such a great marvel. She had no equal
"among the gods who were before since the world was.
"She is living Ra eternally. He hath selected her for "protecting Egypt and for rousing bravery among men. . .
"Horus, the avenger of her father, the first-born of his mother's "husband, whom Ra has engendered to be his glorious seed
"upon earth and to give happiness to future generations,
"being his living image, the King of Upper and Lower
"Egypt, Kamara, the electrum (gold) of kings."

"By my life, by the love of Ra and the favour of my "father Amen, . . . I bear the white crown, I am diademed
"with the red crown, . . . I rule over this land like the son "of Isis, I am mighty like the son of Nu, . . . I shall be "for ever like the star which changeth not. He gave me my "royal power over Egypt and the red country, all the foreign "lands are under my feet . . . all the marvels and the "precious things of this land, they are presented to my "palace altogether . . . (turquoise) of the land of Reshut
"they bring to me the choicest things from the oasis of "Testesu (Dakhel), acacia, juniper, mer-wood . . . all the "good woods of the divine land . . . Tribute is brought to "me from the land of the Tahennu in ivory, seven hundred
"tusks . . . She lives, she is stable, she is in good health,
"she is joyous as well as her double on the throne of Horus
"of the living like the sun, for ever and ever."¹

She reigned for at least thirty-three years, and although the date of her death is not known, her funeral ceremonies are represented on some red sandstone blocks found at Karnak.² The queen is there shown in the form of an Osirian statue, and her inscription reads, "Kamara joins herself to the beauties of Amen," which is to say that death has made her one with the god-head. A personage who is probably Thotmes III., offers his devotions to the statue of the deceased sovereign.¹ She was buried, it may be presumed, with all the pomp befitting so great a queen, in a rock tomb at Thebes. Until recently it was supposed that this tomb existed under the sanctuary of her temple at Deir el-Bahari, which some hidden stairway connected with the burial vault.

¹ From The Obelisk inscriptions at Karnak, NAVILLE, T.H., 48-51.

² LEGRAIN, 1897, Cairo M., Gal. O., 360.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

In the winter of 1904, however, the actual tomb was discovered and cleared by Mr. T. M. Davis, in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings. It is situated far away from the temple, on the other side of the mountain. Before the entrance to the tomb a foundation deposit was found in a shallow hole cut in the rock. The deposit consisted of small alabaster vases, many red pottery vases of ten different shapes, models of tools, with traces of gold leaf upon them, other models in wood and bronze, mats, baskets, a bundle of samples of linen, and a quantity of desiccated bread.²

The subterranean gallery leading to the tomb was of an unprecedented length, curving under ground for a distance of more than 200 metres, when it finally ended in the tomb chamber. This was in a totally ruined condition owing to the bad quality of the rock in which it had been cut. Unfortunately the burial chamber had been rifled long before this discovery, and nothing was found except a fine sarcophagus of red sandstone which had once been the resting place of the queen's body;³ a second sarcophagus with the name of her father Thotmes I.; an empty canopic box, and some fragments of bowls and vases. These were of alabaster, blue glaze and red pottery, and were stamped with the cartouches of the queen, of Thotmes I. and II., and of her great-grandmother Aahmes

¹ N., T.H., 71, 72.

² Report of HOWARD CARTER in Tomb of Hâtshopsîtâ, 104-106.

³ Cairo M., Central Atrium, 528.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Nefertari.¹ The mummy of Hatshepsut had disappeared, and, so far as at present known, has never been found.

Mr. Davis, in his introduction to "The Tomb of Hâtshopsîtû," suggests that one of the unidentified mummies found with those of the Pharaohs in the Deir el-Bahari cachette, may be that of the queen.

There are many portraits extant from which we may gain an idea of Hatshepsut's features (see frontispiece); they are to be seen at Deir el-Bahari and at Karnak, also in the heads of sphinxes that once lined the approach to the great temple. The Berlin and Leyden Museums possess two of these heads, as well as fragments of portrait statues. Part of a magnificent colossal statue of alabaster was found at Karnak and is now exhibited in the Cairo Museum.² The dress and crown had been of gilt metal, and it is thought that this fine figure may be a portrait statue of the queen.

Many small objects connected with the memory of Hatshepsut still remain: glazed pottery bowls, bricks, scarabs, beads and plaques, models of tools, and alabaster vases engraved with her cartouches. The inlaid throne, with the draught board and pieces, which were discovered a few years ago, and are now in the British Museum, are probably also hers.³

Several cartouches of Thotmes II. and Thotmes III. appear on the walls of Deir el-Bahari. Some of these were undoubtedly placed there by the queen's own order; others have been later substitutes for her name. Wanton hands have ruthlessly cut out her cartouches and chiselled away the features of many of her portraits. It has been thought that this destruction was wrought by the impatient hand of her nephew, and that Thotmes III. had reason for so hating his aunt, that he took immediate advantage of his power to deface her temple and insult the memory of its

¹ CARTER, "The Antiquities," etc., in Tomb Hâtshopsîtû, 106-112.

² LEGRAIN, 1904, Room P, No. 562.

³ Rec., X, 126.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

dead builder ; but it is possible that the blame rests with a later generation of rulers, who for reasons of their own, vainly sought to erase the name of Hatshepsut from the list of Egypt's monarchs. The judgment of recent writers on this subject is, that Thotmes III. was responsible for very little of the destruction of the queen's temple. Much of the defacement seems due to Amen-hetep IV., and to Seti I. and Ramses II., who in repairing the devastations of the "heretic king," took that opportunity to erase the figures and cartouches of Hatshepsut, replacing them with their own or with those of the Thotmes kings.

There is room for many interpretations of the story of Hatshepsut and her domestic relations, but no proof that any one of these readings is the literal truth. What we can at least be sure of is, that the reign, having been a peaceful one, was a blessing indeed to a nation long burdened with the wars of ambitious kings.

It is evident from the fine spirited sculptures and the admirably handled portraits which decorate the walls of the Deir el-Bahari temple, that art had reached a high standard ; Egyptian architecture never received more noble contributions , the craft of the marble worker was faultlessly displayed in the dressing of great masses of stone such as the obelisks of Karnak ; while the trained skill that was necessary to rear these monoliths in seven months' time, is proof of the well-organized forces which the architect Senmut had at his command.

The most important testimony to the vigour of Hatshepsut's reign, the strength of her position and the force of her character, is to be found in the history of her successor. Thotmes III. was one of the most aggressive and brilliant monarchs who ever ascended the throne of Egypt ; and yet their joint reign, of at least twenty years, was so dominated by the queen, that Thotmes does not seem to have asserted himself or to have shown any independence of action until the death of Hatshepsut left him sole master of the throne. Thus his early years were completely shadowed by his aunt's strong personality, and he was over thirty before he became a sovereign in anything but the name.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Any attempt which may have been made to dim the memory of the great queen was futile; her records have no uncertain pitch, but ring triumphantly from one end of Egypt to the other. Throughout the Nile Valley, from Buto in the Delta, by way of Beni Hasan, Karnak and Thebes, el Kab and Kom Ombo; to Aswan at the first cataract, and from the far rock cliffs of Sinai, sculptured stone and inscribed stelæ record the reign of Hatshepsut, fulfilling the wish voiced on her obelisk that her name may remain and live on in temple and land "for ever and ever."¹

¹ For histories of the reign, Temple inscriptions, etc., see NAVILLE, Temple Deir el-Bahari; Tomb Hâtshopsûtâ; MASPERO, Struggle of the Nations, 236-254; BRUGSCH, E.P., 142-151.

CHAPTER VIII.

QUEEN HATSHEPSUT TO QUEEN THIV.

NEFERURA, the eldest daughter of Hatshepsut, seems from the large number of existing records concerning her,¹ to have been a person of more importance than was at first supposed. She was certainly Hatshepsut's heiress, as appears from her titles, which name her, "Royal Daughter, "Royal Sister, Sovereign of Both Lands, Divine Wife, "Princess of the North and South."

A relief at Karnak shows the princess wearing the uræus and vulture crown of the queens, while her name is enclosed in a royal oval. She stands between the two divinities, Amen and Hathor, who embrace her as though in blessing. At Sinai a stela was found by Petrie, who states that it was dated in the eleventh year of Queen Neferura,² a fact which suggests that she was already associated with the crown as its legal heiress, in the same way that her mother had been associated by Thotmes I.

The great official of Hatshepsut's reign, Senmut, was the guardian of Neferura, and is often represented holding the infant princess between his knees. Three such statues, in grey, black, and rose granite, are in the Cairo Museum,³ and a similar one is in Berlin. Other instances of Neferura's appearance as Hatshepsut's heiress are found in the queen's

¹ CHAMPOLLION, M. de l'E. cxcl, 3, cxclv, 1, 3; ROSELLINI, Mon. Stor., II, 8; LEPSIUS; WIEDEMANN; DARESSY; LEGRAIN; PETRIE; NEWBERRY.

² PETRIE, Arch. Rep., E.E.F., 1904-5.

³ Room M, 333, 341 bis.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT

temple at Deir el-Bahari, and in inscriptions at Aswan.¹ Several scarabs and funeral cones, stamped with her cartouche, are known, and are published by Wiedemann, Daressy, Petrie and Newberry.

From the great prominence thus given her in contemporary monuments, it seems clear that this princess from the time of her birth, was looked upon as the future queen, and had she lived would certainly have succeeded to her mother's throne. Her death must have occurred before she had arrived at a marriageable age; otherwise we should find Neferura, instead of her younger sister Meryt-ra, united to the heir as royal consort.

MERYT-RA-HATSHEPSET. This princess is but an uncertain figure in the history of the epoch. It is not precisely stated anywhere that Meryt-ra was the daughter of Hatshepsut, but it does not follow that she was not of the queen's family on that account. Hatshepsut and Thotmes had certainly more than one daughter, and yet only one is mentioned. The princess Neferura is called not only "Royal Sister," but is referred to by one of her mother's officials as "the eldest daughter."² There was necessarily then, one other daughter at least, although this second princess never appears in any of the queen's records.

The successor of Hatshepsut, Thotmes III., would have strengthened his claim to the crown through its heiress, according to Egyptian custom; but as Neferura is never mentioned as Thotmes' queen, it is probable that her early death prevented her marriage to her mother's co-regent. The princess who became Thotmes' wife, was that royal daughter who bore the name of the great queen, and there seems to be no reasonable doubt that she was a younger sister of Neferura.

In glancing at the records, few and formal, which remain of Queen Meryt-ra, one is tempted to regard her as having been sacrificed to the greatness of her house. Her personality is quite lost in those of the three individuals with whom her life was passed; a younger daughter of Queen Hatshepsut, wife of a king, and mother of a king; these are the only details concerning her which remain.¹ As she was probably Hatshepsut's only surviving daughter, she was through her mother the heiress of the throne. She seems to have inherited nothing else from that royal parent, or if she did, any tendency towards the exercise of her sovereign rights must have been promptly suppressed by her husband.

¹ de MORGAN, M.I., I, 41; L., D., iii, 20 bis 9.

² Aswan Stela of Pen-nekheb, NAVILLE, T.H., 19.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It was glory enough that she brought the crown of Egypt as a gift to Thotmes III., who has been aptly termed by Brugsch, "the Alexander the Great of Egyptian history." Through the stirring records of his reign, there is never the slightest suggestion that the power was shared with Meryt-ra Hatshepset; the king alone is lord and arbitrator of the destinies of the land, and his queen is only "Great Royal Wife, Beloved of Ra."

The old peaceful days were over, and the land was soon plunged into the tumults and alarms of war. Thotmes always returned victorious from his campaigns, and under his ambitious reign the kingdom was increased until it became a great empire. It is then no wonder that in the highly coloured pictures of the two reigns which included all the young life of Meryt-ra Hatshepset, she should appear as a figure drawn in but faint lines. Her name is occasionally mentioned in the sculptural records still surviving from her time.

At Thebes in the temple of Medinet Habu, the queen accompanies her husband, while a representation of her in the form of a sphinx, has the name of Thotmes engraved upon it. This statue was found in the ruins of the temple of Isis, at Rome, and is now in the Barocco collection. In the "Chapel of the Cow," found at Deir el-Bahari and removed to the Cairo Museum,¹ Thotmes III. is represented as performing ceremonies connected with the worship of the goddess Hathor. He is assisted by his queen Meryt-ia, and by a "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Meryt-amén."

¹ L., D., III, 38, 26 b, c., 64 a, LORET, Les Tombes Thoutmôsis, etc., pl. 6; M.'s S.N., 243, 290; NAVILLE, T.H., 19.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is just possible that Meryt-ra had some influence on the early reign of her son Amen-hetep II., who ascended the throne when he was still a youth; his name is coupled with that of the "Royal Mother Meryt-ra," on a scarab found at Abydos, and in one or two tombs she likewise appears with her son. A scarab with the title "Great Royal Wife," and a second one of lapis-lazuli set in gold, are engraved with the name of Meryt-ra.²

When the tomb of Thotmes III. was opened, it was found to contain amid the debris of its original funeral furnishings, two black uninscribed wooden coffins, each containing the mummy of a woman. It was thought by M. Loret, who discovered them, that they were perhaps a wife and daughter of Thotmes.

SAT-AAH, "The Great Royal Wife," was also a queen of Thotmes III. Her name was first noticed by Mariette, on a fragment of limestone at Abydos,³ and on a block found by Wilkinson at Karnak,⁴ but her position was only established on the opening of the tomb of Thotmes III, in the inscriptions of which, Sat-aah appears as the wife of that king.

A limestone table of offerings in the Cairo Museum gives further information regarding her. From this monument it appears that she was the daughter of Thotmes' nurse; the inscription reads, "The Great Royal Wife, Sat-aah, justified, born of the great nurse the neter shed, Apu "justified."⁵

¹ Room M, 338

² M., A., ii, 40 c.

³ "Justified"—deceased.

⁴ The insc. pub. by NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A. 1903.

⁵ N., Sc., pl. xxviii, 35, 36

⁶ Ibid, 109 (1828).

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

This queen is further recorded on a bas-relief found at Karnak, where she is shown with name and titles, standing before Thotmes I.,¹ a scarab naming her is also known.² The tomb inscriptions of Thotmes, prove that Sat-aah died during the lifetime of her husband. She appears as "Great Royal Wife," with the same titles as those borne by Meryt-ra. This princess was, as we have seen, the royal heiress, who by marrying Thotmes bestowed on him her rights. It is not likely that she was passed over in favour of the daughter of the prince's nurse, since her position as heiress made Meryt-ra of great importance to the claims of the young Thotmes.

The two queens were, therefore, Great Royal Wives at the same time. That this title could be assumed by two contemporary queens, is proved by the instance of the princess Sat-amen, who was called "Great Royal Wife" during the life of her mother, the famous Queen Thiy.

A small temple at Thebes, north of the Ramesseum, was built by Thotmes III., presumably in honour of a queen whose broken statue was found on the site. Only the lower half of the figure remained, the fragment recording a "Royal Wife."

NEB-S-MA. The inscription contains the hieroglyphic sign which represents a foreigner, although the name is purely Egyptian. It frequently happened that the Egyptian kings, marrying foreign women, bestowed on them Egyptian names, and this was probably the case with Queen Neb-s-ma. The style of cutting recalls the XIIth dynasty work, but from its position in the ruins of Thotmes' temple, the statue was supposed to belong to some hitherto unknown queen of Thotmes III.³

TIAA. "Royal Daughter, Royal Mother, Chief Royal Wife."

¹ LEGRAIN, Bul. de l'Inst. Eg., 3rd series, 9, pl. VII, 96.

² F.P. Coll.

³ WEIGALL, Arch. Report, E.E.F., 1904 5.

QUEEN TIAA

QUEEN TIA AND THOMAS IV

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

In a tomb at Thebes, this queen is styled "Royal Wife" only, and appears in connection with Thotmes IV., from which she was thought to have been his consort. Two double statues have since been discovered of this king, seated by the side of Queen Tiaa, who in both groups is called "The principal Royal Wife whom he loves," and the "Royal Mother."

M. Maspero, in his life of Thotmes IV., has shown that Queen Tiaa is to be regarded as the daughter of Thotmes III., probably by a mother who was not royal; that she was the queen of Amenhotep II., and the mother of Thotmes IV.¹

Mr. Petrie notes that Tiaa could scarcely have been the "principal Royal Wife" of Thotmes IV., since another well-known queen figures in that connection,² and he also calls her the mother, instead of the consort, of that king.³

The young prince Thotmes appears in a Theban tomb as one of a group of small figures, who are called king's sons. The names of Thotmes' companions have been carefully erased, and there is nothing to show whether they were, perhaps, other sons, early deceased, of Queen Tiaa, or the children of slaves. No details of Tiaa's life are known.

The fine statue in black granite of this king and queen, found in 1903 by M. Legrain at Karnak, represents Tiaa as a beautiful woman, with a face rather older than that of the young king by her side, whom she embraces. She wears the tight clinging robe and huge wig of Egyptian princesses, and on her brow is the royal serpent.⁴ A similar group, which was discovered twenty years ago in the Fayûm, has since disappeared. The name and titles of Tiaa occur on a fragment of a blue glazed vase now in the collection of Lord Amherst.⁵

¹ In Tomb Thoutmôsis IV., xiv, xv, xix.

² Queen Mut-em-ua.

³ P., H E., vol. II, 164, 165.

Cairo M., Room M, No 322.

⁵ NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A., 1902.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

MUT-EM-UA.

"Royal Wife ; Great Royal Mother ;
"Divine Mother ; Lady of Both Lands."

This queen is generally considered to have been the wife of Thotmes IV. She was possibly his half-sister, and the daughter of Amen-hetep II. Her son was Amen-hetep III., who has made famous the name of his mother in his temple inscriptions at Luxor, where she is specially honoured. Although she is styled "Lady of Both Lands," the other title of birth, "Royal Daughter," is missing,¹ but it is possibly supplied to her in that of a queen, whose name reads Arat, on a stela at Knossos, where she accompanies Thotmes.

Mr Petrie notes that this name is written by two signs, which may be "merely an idiogram for the 'goddess queen,'"² referring probably to Mut-em-ua. The queen in this instance has the titles "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Great Royal Wife."³

Her son, Amen-hetep III., seems to have possessed rights through his mother, but was, perhaps, dissatisfied with his father's descent from the low-born Aset. This defect he proceeded to rectify by the same process as that adopted by his ancestress, Queen Hatshepsut. In his temple at Luxor, Amen-hetep records the renewed intervention of Amen, who again condescends to purify the race, and Amen-hetep is born of a divine father, while his mother is Mut-em-ua. It is significant that in these sculptures the royal descent of the queen seems a recognized fact.

A different view has recently been taken by certain writers concerning the parentage of Amen-hetep III. This

¹ MASPERO, Tomb Thoutmôsis IV., xxvi.

² P., H.E., vol. II, 170.

³ L., D., iii, 69 z.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

theory makes him the son of Amen-hetep II., or of some priest of Amen married to Mut-em-ua. M. Maspero says: "The answer to this question is given on the monuments. At Luxor, in the scene of the theogamy, it is stated that the god Amen came towards the queen under the form of the Majesty of this husband Thoutmôsis IV."

"At el Kab, Amenothès III. states that he completed the little temple as a 'memorial of his father Thoutmôsis IV.' The terms are sufficiently explicit to expel all doubts; Thoutmôsis was certainly the husband of Mut-em-ua and the father of Amenothès III."¹

Several portraits of the queen were carved in the Luxor temple, where she was shown with that half mysterious, half pathetic beauty of expression, which is so often found in the low-relief sculptures of Egyptian women at this period.

Mut-em-ua is also represented with Amen-hetep's famous colossi at Thebes which dominate the plain, and were known to the ancients as the statues of "Memnon." At the side of the throne, and by the feet of the seated Pharaoh, are the smaller figures of his mother and of his wife.

A fine sacred boat in granite, seven feet long, still exists, with the name and titles of Queen Mut-em-ua engraved upon it. This boat may have belonged to the service of the Luxor temple, where the king's mother was of supreme importance. It is now in the British Museum.²

Several princesses of the family of Thotmes IV. are on record. They were probably his daughters, and their names read, Thaa, Takheta, Petahuha, Takhetaui, Meryt-ptah, Sathora, Nefciamen, Uaay, Henut-anu, and Amenemapet. Many years ago when Rhind was excavating at Thebes, he made a curious discovery in a tomb which had been sealed under Amen-hetep III.

¹ Tomb Thoutmôsis IV., xxiv.

² A.B., 34.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The burial place had been rifled, and in the lower chamber were broken and nameless mummies, while in the upper one, amongst fragments of tomb furnishings, there were a number of small wooden labels containing the names of the princesses above mentioned, who are described as "of the house of the royal children of Menkheperu-Ra" (Thotmes IV).¹ The labels are supposed to have been used to designate the ownership of articles of tomb furniture, a matter which might very well give rise to confusion, where so many princesses were laid in the same tomb.

The princess Takheta is thought by Petrie to have been the daughter of some captive woman of the Kheta tribes.² All of these princesses living in the brilliant epoch of the Thotmes, may well have had stories of their own, full of interest and even bearing with importance on the history of their era ; yet, with two exceptions, no word concerning them has descended to modern times, except the small labels in hieratic writing, left perhaps by chance in the Theban tomb.

The exceptions are Thaa, whose canopic jar is in the Amherst collection,³ and the royal daughter Amenemapet, a portrait of whom is graven in the tomb of a scribe, Horemheb, at Thebes. She is there represented as a child, held on the knees of Horemheb, who was her tutor.⁴

NEBT-U, whose name is on one of the labels, appears to have been of more important rank than the others. She is called "king's daughter, daughter of the royal son Satum." Mention is made of this queen's name by an official, Nebamen, who lived in the reigns of two of the Thotmes, and who was, "keeper of the house of the Royal Wife Nebtu." Nothing positive of her position is known, beyond

¹ A.Z., xxi, 124 ; B., R.P., xi

² P., H.E., vol. II, 144.

³ NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A., 1903.

⁴ M.A.F., v, 434 ; N., P.S.B.A., 1903.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

the facts that she was a king's grand-daughter and a royal wife, either as a king's consort, or as one of the heiress princesses. Two or three scarabs of this queen are known on which she is called, "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister."¹

¹ N., Sc, xxvi, 32 ; F P. Coll

CHAPTER IX.

QUEEN THÏY.

THÏY.

" Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Royal
" Mother, The Royal Wife, the Great " Lady of the two Lands, Queen of the " North and South."

THIS celebrated queen, the beloved and honoured wife of Amen-hetep III., is one of the most picturesque figures of antiquity ; a figure thrown out in strong relief against the background of uncertain shadows which dims so large a part of Egyptian history. Her personality is made living and keen by reason of the unusual expression given by Amen-hetep to the affection he bore her. In addition to the usual titles of a king's consort, she is described as " Royal Daughter " and " Royal Sister," although she was neither the daughter nor the sister of a king, but the child of parents who are often named in connection with her, and who were not of royal lineage.

The full queenly titles which ThÏy held in common with the great heiress princesses of Egypt, were therefore only honorary, and bestowed on her by Amen-hetep, in apparent indifference to custom or law. What the circumstances were which induced the king to depart from the traditions of his house and choose a wife of low origin, can only be surmised, as the annals are silent concerning the love story of Amen-hetep III.

QUEEN TITI

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is possible that no sister-princess or other heiress of the royal line was available, when the time came for the young king's marriage. Through his mother Mut-em-ua, Amen-hetep's claim to the crown seems to have been an unquestioned one. Such defect as he found in his father's descent, he remedied by claiming a parentage from Amen-Ra. The youthful prince was only about sixteen at the time of the death of Thotmes IV., and his own accession.¹ The inscriptions of the Luxor temple which record his early years, refer only to himself and to his mother, with no mention of Queen Thiy; a fact suggesting that the temple was sculptured before his marriage. The date of that event cannot be exactly placed, although in the second year of his reign he was already married to Thiy, as shown by a scarab which records a cattle hunt dated in his second regnal year, and naming "The Great Royal Wife, Thiy."

From time to time Amen-hetep issued sets of large scarabs, on which were inscribed the histories of special events in his reign. This is the only instance known in which scarabs have been used in the place of stelæ. These great scarabs are of a fine green enamel and are very numerous; the dated ones are of the second, tenth, and eleventh years of the reign, and record cattle and lion hunts, the arrival of a foreign bride at the king's court, and the making of a lake for the queen. Among the undated scarabs, one fixes the boundaries of the kingdom; and another, which is possibly the official announcement of Amen-hetep's marriage, reads: "King of the North and South Neb-maat-Ra, son of the sun Amen-hetep, Prince of Thebes, Giver of Life, The Great Royal Wife Thiy, The Living One—the name of her father—Iuaa, the name of her mother Thuaa, she is the wife of the Great King." All of the scarabs begin with the names and titles of the king and of Thiy.²

¹ P, H.E., vol. II, 177.

² Catalogued by WIEDEMANN, A.G., 381, 6.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Few personages of Egyptian history have given rise to more speculation than the famous queen of Amen-hetep III. Many scholars have attempted to account for her origin, and various theories have been set forth in the effort to explain her position. The extensive traces of Asiatic culture found in Egypt at this period have led certain writers to claim an Asiatic birth for Queen Thy. Hincks was the first writer to suggest that she was a Syrian, and that the religious revolution which followed later was due to her influence; this theory was adopted by Mariette, Brugsch, and Lauth; Wiedemann and Meyer found a Libyan origin for her; while Petrie and Budge recognised in Thy one of the Mitannian princesses of the Tel-el-Amarna tablets.

An opposite view of her nationality was taken by Maspero, Rayet, and Bouriant; who, without going so far afield as Asia, found in Egypt itself sufficient grounds for solving the problem. As early as 1877, M. Maspero showed his reasons for believing that Amen-hetep's queen was an Egyptian of middle rank, possibly of Heliopolitan origin. The names of her parents as given on the scarabs are unaccompanied by titles of any sort, or by signs indicating a foreign origin; these facts seem to preclude all possibility that she was the daughter of royalty, either Egyptian or foreign.

The soundness of this explanation of Thy's birth was proved when the tomb of her parents, Iuaa and Thuaa, was discovered by Mr. Davis, during the winter of 1905, in the Valley of the Tombs of the Kings. The sealed tomb when opened was found to contain its entire treasure of original furnishing, which was of an unprecedented richness. The mummies of Iuaa and Thuaa reposed in magnificent gilded coffins lined with silver, and inlaid with lapis-lazuli, turquoise, and carnelian. The tomb furniture included funeral couches, chairs, tables, boxes, vases and jars, ushabti figures, and a chariot, all of exquisite workmanship, plated with gold and encrusted with coloured enamels.¹

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Many of these beautiful objects were engraved with the names of Amen-hetep III and Thiy, and had evidently been placed there as offerings. The tomb itself had remained hidden, and had happily escaped spoliation through many centuries. It was entirely undecorated, but Queen Thiy had honoured her parents with a burial of regal magnificence, and the one tomb chamber was literally packed with the glittering gold ornamentation of the burial outfit. The sarcophagus of Iuaa gave his titles as, "Divine Father, Keeper of the cattle of Min of Anpu, "(Ekhnim) Master of the Horse, Friend of the King;" while Thuaa is shown to have been, "Dresser to the King, "Royal Mother of the chief Wife of the King, Chantress of "Amen," none of these titles being royal.

The mummies are well preserved; the face of Iuaa is one of singular beauty and majesty, and shows him to have been a man of advanced age at the time of his death. If the type is not purely Egyptian, it is possible that there was a slight mixture of foreign blood inherited from a Syrian ancestor; but by both, Thiy's parents not only seem to have been Egyptian, but were both devoted to the service of the gods of Egypt, Amen of Thebes and Min of Anpu; suggesting that their native place was Ekhnim.

This disposes of the theory that Queen Thiy, inheriting from her parents the worship of the foreign god Adon, induced her son to slight the majesty of Amen and set up in his place the Asiatic deity. The reasons which transformed Thiy's son from Amen-hetep IV. into Khuen-aten, the "heretic king," and which brought about the great revolution of the XVIIIth dynasty, must be sought for elsewhere.

The view taken by Maspero, in his sketch of the parents of Thiy, holds that Thuaa's position at court as "dresser to the king," led to the meeting of Amen-hetep with her young daughter Thiy. It has often happened in Oriental countries, that a girl of the harem has so captivated the son of the house, that she has been made his lawful wife. Some such circumstance may have occurred in the case of Amen-hetep and Thiy.

¹ Cairo M., Room T.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The girl of low birth who became queen of Egypt must have shown early evidence of an unusually strong character, for Amenhetep in extreme youth married her, placed the crown on her head, and bestowed upon her all the honours of the heiress princesses of Egypt. That the young queen was beautiful is evident from her portraits; that she was a woman of great ability and powerful influence, is proved by her association with her husband in all of his ceremonial records. She apparently shared the crown with him, as though she had been its lineal heiress. To the end of his life she held the king's devotion, and had so important a part in Egyptian affairs, that in more than one instance a foreign potentate appealed to her directly in matters affecting certain international relations.

On the edge of the desert beyond the plain of Thebes, between the river and the towering cliffs of the Theban hills, are the ruins of the palace where Queen Thiy lived. The walls of the rooms in which she led her home life are partly standing; the beautiful painted floors still exist; the hall where she with the king received their courtiers, has its throne dais in perfect preservation, although it is more than three thousand years since Amenhetep reared the palace and placed his bride therein.

It must have been in its day a splendid dwelling-place. The ruins show a building of vast proportions; a large portal and vestibule lead to the audience chamber, behind which is a banqueting hall, beautifully decorated harem apartments, and bath rooms. Then follow suites of smaller rooms, probably used for officials and servants; and still beyond these, kitchens and store rooms. In the latter, various articles of provisions were placed in jars and amphoræ, carefully sealed and labelled. Remains of wine jars were found with sealings which gave not only the date of vintage, but the names of the wine-maker and of his vineyard.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Brick was the material chiefly used in the construction of the palace, which was of one story, the roof supported by small wooden columns gilded and painted, and having capitals in the form of lily buds. Walls, floors and ceilings were painted in gaily coloured designs, and in some places still show flights of pigeons, ducks or butterflies; the floors of the apartments which were presumably the queen's are especially beautiful, being painted to represent rippling water in which fish are swimming; while amid lotus and papyrus plants are seen ducks of soft tints and life-like forms.

The careful art displayed in all scenes where any sort of life is depicted, is in curious contrast to the roughly indicated geometrical designs on walls and ceilings; where, however, it is possible that there was not light enough to show deficiencies. This palace, together with one which is almost its counterpart, that of Khuenaten at Tel el-Amarna, form the unique specimens of royal residences still existing among the ruins of the ancient kingdom.¹

Amen-hetep III. showed from his early youth a spirited independence of action, when he slighted the prejudices of the royal house, and married for love a woman of the people. Doubtless many such alliances had been made by other kings, but the brides so introduced into the royal harems had no queenly rank. Occasionally one such wife would obtain a title through her son's accession; but to ¹ The palace of Amen-hetep III. at Medinet Habu was discovered by M. DARESSY, and excavated by MM. TYTUS and NEWBERRY during the seasons of 1902-3. It is described in Mr. TYTUS' report on that work, and in NEWBERRY and GARSTANG'S History of Egypt, 156, 157.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Thiy was reserved the unique honour of elevation from the ranks of the people to a queen's throne. Having once made this marriage after his own inclination, Amen-hetep seems never to have wearied in acts of devotion to his wife. He gave to her the town of Zalu in Lower Egypt, and made for her pleasure a lake, on the opening of which he issued a commemorative set of scarabs; these bear the following inscription: "Eleventh year on Athyr 1, under "the majesty of Horus . . . mighty of valour, smiter of "the Asiatics, King of the South and North, the Lord "maker of created things, Neb-maat-Ra, chosen of Ra, son "of the sun Amen-hetep, Prince of Thebes, Giver of life; "the Royal Wife, the mighty Lady Thiy, the living one,— "the name of her father, Iuaa, the name of her mother, "Thuaa; his majesty ordered the making of a lake for the "royal wife, the great Lady Thiy, in her city of Zaru (or "Zalu), its length 3,600 cubits, its breadth 600 cubits; in "the first festival in Athyr 16, sailed his majesty in the "bark Aten-neferu in his saloon.¹

As the lake was begun the 1st of Athyr (October), and opened by the king, whose bark sailed over it on the 16th of the same month, the whole work seems to have been accomplished in fifteen days. The construction of a lake over a mile long and a quarter of a mile wide in so short a time, seems an impossible achievement. Mr. Petrie suggests that it may have been only the simple work of flooding some already existing depression by means of a canal, probably during the time of the autumn inundation.²

It would seem that Amen-hetep wished to associate Thiy with himself in every act of his reign; even in the records of his lion and cattle hunts, her name appears with the king's, although she could scarcely have accompanied him in person on these expeditions.

The king who was thus so charmed by a daughter of the people, was one of the most brilliant of that group of conquerors, whose exploits made of the kingdom of Egypt an Empire. It was under the prowess of Amen-hetep III. that its zenith was reached, and its boundaries fixed from the extreme South of Nubia, to the distant lands of Assyria and Mesopotamia, including the entire valley of the Euphrates.¹

¹ Zeitschrift. Aeg. Sprache, XV, 87.

² P.'s H.E., vol. II, 184.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Throughout the land of Egypt, and extending even to the frontier and Nubian towns, the king erected monuments and carved on their walls the immortal story of his devotion to Queen Thÿ. She appears by his side in innumerable instances, on the more important sculptural scenes and statues, and on various small objects such as scarabs, rings and seals. She is represented in such a way that we may presume her title of Queen of Egypt to have been no empty compliment, but to have implied an active part in all ceremonials, if not in the government itself.

She is the presiding genius of a small but beautiful temple at Sedeinga, erected by Amen-hetep in her honour; the inscriptions record that the king "made his monuments for the great and mighty heiress, the mistress of all lands, Thÿ."² She also accompanies her husband on his famous monuments, the two colossi which overlook the Theban plain.

The temple before which the giant statues were erected has long since disappeared, and to-day in lonely state the great Amen-hetep, his mother Mut-em-ua, and the beloved Thÿ, keep silent watch over the new world which is rising from the ruins of their dead empire. They are but shattered figures, giving small idea of the royal forms and features which they once represented.

According to the reports of ancient Greek travellers, one of these statues had often been heard to sing at early dawn; this effect may have been the result of a trick, to impress the visitor, or was possibly a natural phenomenon caused by the rapid heating of currents of cold air within the stone ; the singing ceased long ago when the figure from which it emanated, having been damaged by an earthquake, was built up again with rough masonry.

¹ N. and G., H.E., 142.

² L., D., iii, 82.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

One of the most splendid monuments of the age was erected near the king's residence at Thebes, and has lately been recovered from Medinet Habu. It is a fine colossal group in limestone, representing Amen-hetep and Thyi, accompanied by the princess Takhait. The group had been shattered and is now only in fragments, which will, however, be restored as nearly as possible and set up in the Cairo Museum. The heads are fortunately intact, that of Thyi is a beautiful specimen of the best XVIIIth dynasty work. The huge vulture wings which form the head-dress are surmounted by a crown having three uræi in front.¹

Queen Thyi was the mother of Amen-hetep's heir, Amen-hetep IV., and of the princesses Sat-amen, Takhait, Hent-ta-neb,² Bakt-aten³ and possibly of a second son, Thotmes, who died young.⁴ The daughters appear on various small objects, and in the sculptures of the great temple at Soleb, where they are shown assisting their parents in festival scenes.

King Amen-hetep seems to have lived a long life with the beloved Thyi, as he married her shortly after his accession, and reigned for 36 years.⁵ After his death, the widowed queen erected altars to the memory of her lord. One of these still exists in the distant town of Gurob ; it has the inscription : " She made her monuments of her beloved brother Neb-ma-Ra."⁶ She may, then, for a short space have held an independent authority in the government, or have acted as regent for her young son Amen-hetep IV. ; this is suggested by a cartouche in one of the quarries of the Tel el-Amarna hills. The quarry had apparently been worked

¹ North Portico, 380 bis, 380 ter.

² P., I., xvii, 20.

³ P., H.E., vol. II, 203-4.

⁴ L., K., 385.

⁵ L., D., iii, 71 ; P., H.E., vol. II, 186.

⁶ P., I., xxiv, 7.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

under her order alone, for the queen's name appears unaccompanied by those of her husband or her son.¹

Thiy's influential position in both reigns under which she lived must have been one of wide celebrity; for in the famous Babylonian Tablets found in the ruins of Khuenaten's city,² there is a communication from Dushratta, king of Mitanni, to Thiy herself. In this letter the foreign king calls upon the queen to remember his old friendship with her husband, and reminds her of certain transactions between himself and Amen-hetep, about which Dushratta declares that Thiy alone has any knowledge. From the same letter it also appears that Thiy had sent a messenger to Dushratta, asking that the former friendly relations between the two countries should be maintained. In other letters, Dushratta sends his salutations to Thiy, all of which references show her importance in the diplomatic relations of Egypt with foreign lands.

She was apparently a woman of great beauty; the portraits of her which were executed during her husband's reign, represent a face of pure Egyptian type, youthful and sweet, with a slightly projecting chin. Several such portraits of the queen are known, one of the best being that in the tomb of Ouserhat, at Assaif in Western Thebes.³

When Amen-hetep died and his son ascended the throne, the old regime continued for a time, and Amen-hetep IV. dwelt in his father's palace at Thebes. Then came the great revolution, the evidences of which make

¹ P., A., 4, xlii.

² The Babylonian Tablets were discovered some years ago in the ruins of Khuenaten's palace at Tel el-Amarna. They are written in cuneiform, and are of great value, in connection with the king's foreign relations. They had been deposited in "The place of the records of the palace of the King." For translations, etc., see: Records of the Past, xii-xviii; and series ii, vols. I-IV; Proceedings, Society Biblical Arch.; Mission Archeol. Franc., Cairo; BEZOLD, Oriental Diplomacy; PETRIE, Tel el-Amarna, etc.

³ Pub. by CARTER in his Report for 1902-3.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

this reign the greatest anomaly of Egyptian history. What the sequence was in the acts of the drama, nothing explains. With almost the earliest identification of Amen-hetep IV. with his country the revolution is an accomplished fact; Amen has been dethroned and Aten has taken his place as supreme god of Egypt; the powerful hierarchy of Amen has been defied and their order degraded; royal Thebes has been abandoned by the king and a new capital city has been built; the young monarch has even repudiated his father's name, and has assumed instead, that of Khuenaten, i.e., "Splendour of the sun's disk." The adherents of the "heretic king" follow him to the abode he has chosen, worship with him the new god, and hew their tombs in the adjacent hills; a great city has sprung up to be a home for Aten; while suddenly, released from the old order of rigid law, the arts make a leap forward and find an expression, wholly new to Egypt, in a decided attempt at realism.

This movement felt its way towards expression with varying results. The former conventional rapid line with which the old artists drew the human figure, gave place to more flowing ones, and full rounded forms resulted, which, if they lost something of the early force and dignity, gained much in human feeling.

Plants and foliage were depicted with such vigour and beauty of treatment, that as decorative art they can scarcely be surpassed. When these methods came to be applied to portraiture, the results were even more revolutionary. Queen Thiy herself is represented in a way which differs so radically from the earlier portraits, as to seem evidence in favour of the theory of an Asiatic origin.

The head is greatly elongated, the mouth droops at the corners, the chin is brought prominently forward, the eyes and forehead have a more natural treatment, and the throat is long and slender. In every particular, except the prominence of the chin, these later portraits differ from those of Thiy's youthful days; they have a rare distinction, and one looks in vain for the features of Amen-hetep's queen in the flower-like face of Khuenaten's mother.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The most curious form taken by the new art was in its representations of the king, who is made to appear as an absurd caricature of his mother. That he was not in fact the monstrosity represented by these sculptures is shown in several early portraits: chiefly the fine statuette in the Louvre Museum, which proves that he bore a close likeness to Queen Thiy. Having, then, had no physical deformity which the realistic artists of the day felt impelled to reproduce, the exaggerated pictures of Khuenaten are most puzzling. *

Various theories have been set forth by Egyptologists, searching for the clue to Khuenaten's history, and the real meaning of the extraordinary religious and political movement of which he was the centre. Many writers are of the opinion that he was an enthusiast and reformer; others claim that in the overthrow of Amen and the humiliation of Thebes, lay a deep political scheme which originated in the brain of Khuenaten's father. If Amen-hetep was as great a statesman as he was a conqueror, he could not have failed to perceive the ominous and ever-growing storm-cloud which threatened on the Egyptian horizon. The crown was looked upon at that time as the actual property of Amen-Ra, and his priesthood was in consequence of a supreme importance. Through years it had been growing in arrogance and increasing in power, until there could have been no question as to what the inevitable result would be, unless something could be done to hold the priests in check.

It seems more than likely that Amen-hetep took alarm at this state of things, and cast about for some means of curtailing the priestly power. Nothing could attain that end but the overthrow of the god whom they served, and the substitution of a less important deity. This was, perhaps, the policy taught by Amen-hetep to his son, who upon his own accession made the desperate attempt to free the throne from the encroaching power of Amen.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The god chosen to supersede Amen was Aten, the old local deity of Heliopolis. It is significant that Amen-hotep had himself erected altars to Aten, at Memphis and Thebes; and that the boat in which their majesties had taken a pleasure sail in his 12th regnal year, to inspect the Queen's lake, had the name Nefertu-Aten, "the beauties of Aten."

Queen Thiy may have played an important part in the revolution; it is certain that she was in sympathy with it, and she probably took up her residence in Khuepaten's new capital. Here he had erected a great temple to Aten, which is described as having been about two hundred and fifty feet square, standing in an enclosed space half a mile in length.¹ The sculptures show the visit of Queen Thiy to this temple, into which she is led by the king followed by his court. The explanatory inscriptions state that this is the "Introduction of the Queen-mother Thiy, to behold her sun-shadow."² Together they praised the Aten or "sun's disk," in an incomparable hymn to nature :³

"Thy appearing is beautiful in the horizon of Heaven,

"The living Aten, the beginning of Life.

"Thou arisest in the horizon of the East,

"Thou fillest every land with thy beauty

"The cattle all rest in their pastures,

"Where grow the trees and herbs ;

"The birds fly in their haunts

"Their wings adoring thy Ka.

"The ships go forth both North and South,

"And every way opens at thy rising ;

"The fish in the river swim up to greet thee.

"Thy beams are within the deeps of the great sea.

¹ At what is now Tel el-Amarna. P., H.E., vol. II, 221.

² BRUGSCH, E.P., 221.

³ The Hymn to Aten is edited by Prof. BREASTED and translated by Mr. GRIFFITH. Pub. by Prof. PETRIE, H.E., 215-218.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"How many are the things which thou hast made ?
"Thou createst the land by thy will, thou alone,
"With peoples, herds and flocks,
"Everything on the face of the earth that walketh on its feet,
"Everything in the air that flieth with its wings.
"In the hills from Syria to Kush, and the plains of Egypt,
"Thou givest to every one his place, thou fimest then lives,
"To every one his belongings, reckoning his length of days ,
"Their tongues are diverse in their speech,
"Their natures in the colour of their skin.
"As a divider thou dividest the strange peoples.

"Thou makest the seasons of the year to create all thy works :
"The winter making them cool, the summer giving warmth
"Thou makest the far-off heaven, that thou mayest rise in it,
"That thou mayest see all that thou madest when thou wast alone."

Upon one occasion the Queen-mother gave a feast, probably at her own palace in the new city, and entertained her son and his queen, accompanied by three of his daughters. The relief which records this festivity is found in the Tel el-Amarna tomb of Huy, who was overseer of the house and steward for Queen Thyi.

The last contemporary memorial of the queen appears to be the mention of her name in a letter to Khuenaten from Dushratta, who sends gifts and salutations to the Queen-mother Thyi. On this letter a note in hieratic dates its receipt early in the twelfth year of Khuenaten's reign : as six years of this time included a co-regency with his father, the date of the letter was in the sixth independent year of Khuenaten. Amen-hotep III. was about sixteen¹ when he first recorded the "Royal Wife Thyi," who could scarcely have been younger than fourteen. If this is added to the thirty-six years of her husband's reign, and the six years of her son's during which she is known to have been alive, it appears that Thyi was at least fifty-six years of age at the time of her death.

¹ P., H.E., vol. II, 56, 177.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Mr. Petrie has recently found a small portrait head of the queen, which bears her cartouche on the crown ;¹ it is a marvellous bit of realistic sculpture, and certainly represents a woman of nearly sixty. (See Plate No X.)

At an unrecorded date, some time during the reign of her son, the queen died. Her body was wrapped in sheets of pure gold, laid in a magnificent gold coffin, and enclosed in a great shrine of gilded wood.

During the season of 1906-7, Mr. Davis, who was excavating in the Valley of the Kings at Thebes, discovered the rough unfinished tomb which held much of the burial outfit of the queen, including the shrine, and a coffin enclosing a mummy. The shrine had been broken up, the cartouches of Khuenaten, who had buried his mother, were defaced ; but the body which was supposed to be that of the queen remained untouched ; and when the excavators entered the tomb, the mummy lay in the midst of its golden wrappings.

The coffin lid was practically intact, and proved to be one of the finest ever found ; the ground was a net-work of solid gold, elaborately inlaid with a scale-like design in lapis-lazuli, turquoise, and red and white carnelian. The hands of gold were crossed on the breast, and a broad gold band with inlaid hieroglyphs stretched to the feet. The head had been covered with a golden mask, which had fallen off. The mummy was still adorned with a beautiful gold and enamelled necklace, and wore the golden vulture-crown of Egyptian queens. The wings, delicately engraved and shimmering with iridescent colour, were folded about the head and fastened at the back.

The tomb had, unfortunately, a great crack across the ceiling, from which the plaster had dropped away, allowing water to pour into the sepulchre and greatly damaging the contents ; the wood had rotted, and the mummy—a long slender blackened form—crumbled like ashes to the touch.

¹ From Sinai. Cairo M., Room T. Arch. Report, 1904-5.

QUEEN TITI

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The inscriptions were in the name of Khuenaten, who had made the great shrine for his mother Thiy. Many articles were found which had formed part of the tomb-furnishing; they included vases, pots, figures and models, of a light green glaze; and four alabaster canopic jars. The lids of these vases are in the form of human heads, which are presumably portraits of the queen, they are works of the rarest beauty, and are almost unequalled as specimens of an idealized portraiture. The heads are of ivory white alabaster, with enamelled eyes and lapis-lazuli eyebrows; and all but one are in an excellent condition.

The greater part of the contents of the tomb was conveyed in safety to the Museum at Cairo, where it was placed on exhibition in the room which contains the mummies and furniture of the queen's parents¹. The tomb itself was not far from that of Iuaa and Thuaa, and was in the same style, undecorated and with but a single chamber approached by a steep flight of steps cut in the rock.

When the supposed body of Queen Thiy was examined, a surprising discovery was made. The bones, instead of indicating a woman of sixty, are said to be those of a young man under twenty-five years of age. As the inscriptions refer to the queen, the objects found are almost certainly to be regarded as belonging to her burial. How a young man's body, wearing a queen's crown and jewels, came to be substituted for that of Thiy, is a mystery for some future discovery to solve.

The contents of the tomb lay in great confusion, and suggested a hasty removal from some former burial place. Perhaps the queen's body had been destroyed, and the priests in charge had hurriedly replaced it by the nearest mummy at hand, a thing which frequently happened when neglect on the part of tomb attendants had resulted in the loss of a royal mummy. Or it is possible that in the contents of this tomb there are parts of two different burials, confused in the removal.

¹ Cairo M., Room T.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The youth of the mysterious mummy seems to preclude the possibility of its being Khuenaten himself, but it might be some prince of his house, or of that of Amen-hetep III ; in this case the golden vulture is probably to be regarded as the vulture of Mut, and not as the crown of the queens of Egypt.

There are many portraits and other memorials of Thiy extant. She is often figured by the side of Amen-hetep III. ; on the colossi and temple inscriptions at Thebes, Gurob, Soleb, and Sedeinga ; on statues and on the large historical scarabs ; at Tel el-Amarna, alone as in the quarry inscriptions, with Khuenaten in the temple ceremonies, and in the tomb of Huy.

Her face is found on several "trial pieces," one of which, a lovely example of the new art portraiture, is preserved in the Flinders Petrie collection.¹ She is prominent in the Tel el-Amarna letters ; and alabaster ushabti figures bearing her name were placed in the tomb of her husband at Thebes. A toilet box in the Turin Museum and small articles preserved in various collections contain her cartouche ; many of her scarabs are known ; and an enamelled vase given to her by the king is one of the finest specimens of ceramic art in the Cairo Museum.² In some instances she is adored as a goddess.

The great revolutionary movement, which was at its climax during Thiy's last years, gave a sudden freedom to thought and feeling which found a vent in every direction. A short and brilliant period of independent productiveness flashed into being ; and the creations of this age prove the variety of forms Egyptian workers could produce when freed from conventional limitations. The literature, the poetry of the age, the extraordinary approach to modern thought in its philosophy, the monotheistic character of its religious principles, the admirable fidelity to nature in all of its expressions, make the reign of the "heretic king" one of the most remarkable in ancient history.

¹ Pub. in P.'s H E., vol. II, 182.

² South Hall, Case H, No. 747.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

In many senses the revolution was the production of genius; perhaps Khuenaten himself was that genius, or it may be that his policy of reform and freedom only removed the seal on individual silence, and opened the way for free expression to many minds of genius about him.

Of the daughters of Amen-hetep and Thÿ, the heiress was SAT-AMEN, "the Royal Daughter, the Lady of both Lands, the Great Royal Wife, living."

A stela¹ in the Cairo Museum pictures the princess as a child accompanied by her nurse. She is also recorded on a statue of her steward Amenhetep, son of Hapi,² on a disk from Tel el-Amarna,³ and on a blue glazed ring from the ruins of her father's palace at Thebes⁴ Two memorials of Sat-amen, the fragments of an ebony box,⁵ and a blue kohl-tube,⁶ call her the daughter of Amen-hetep, and add the title of "Great Royal Wife."

This title does not apparently place the princess where one might expect to find her, i.e., as the consort of her brother Amen-hetep IV., since that king is always accompanied by his queen Nefertiti. The name of Sat-amen never appears with his, but is coupled only with that of her father. She was probably one of those unmarried heiresses who bore the title of royal wife as a birthright, signifying her destiny as a king's consort; or she may have been married to an elder brother, a possible heir of Amen-hetep, who died early. In any case, the fact that she was Great

¹ MARIETTE, A., II, pl. 49.

² Annales du Service des Antiquités, ii, 283.

³ PETRIE, Tel el-A., xiii, 6.

⁴ Coll., Mr. H. THOMPSON, I, fig. 1.

⁵ B.M., No. 5899a; Arch. Journal, vol. VIII, 39.

⁶ Coll., Mr. MACGREGOR, pub. by NEWBERRY, P.S.B.A., 1902,

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Royal Wife during the lifetime of her mother, Queen Thty, proves that the title could be held by more than one queen at the same time. In this instance it represented the rank of royal consort only for the queen, while for the princess it was the title of her position as heiress.¹

In the tomb of Iuaa and Thuaa, two fine gilded arm-chairs inscribed with the name of Sat-amen were found, which had probably been placed there as offerings from the princess to her grandparents.² Her representations on one of these chairs show Sat-amen as a child, presenting offerings to the goddess of the Nile. On the back, the scene displays Queen Thty, accompanied by two of her children, one nameless, while the other, Sat-amen, stands in front of the queen and is evidently the more important one of the two daughters.

From the facts that this heiress princess is not named as the wife of the heir, and that, in the only portraits of her which survive, she is shown as a child, it seems clear that she died young and before she could assume the crown of Great Consort, to which her birth entitled her.

Mr. Petrie thinks that the restoration of a chapel of Amen-hetep II. at Thebes was made by Amen-hetep III. to honour his daughter Sat-amen, as fragments of a relief in her name were found on its site.³

Takhait, another daughter of Amen-hetep and Thty, perhaps took Sat-amen's place as heiress at that princess's death; Takhait accompanies her parents in the colossal group from Medinet Habu, and wears the royal vulture and uræus of the queen's crown.⁴

¹ See page 68.

² Cairo M., Room T, Case N.

³ PETRIE, Six Temples, 6.

⁴ Cairo M., North Portico, 381.

CHAPTER X.

FOREIGN WIVES OF AMENHETEP III. AND OTHER QUEENS OF XVIIIITH DYNASTY.

AMEN-HETEP had other wives besides his brilliant queen Thy, having contracted several alliances with foreign princesses. GILUGHIPA, or KIRGHIPA, was one of the chief of these.¹ She was the daughter of Satharna, King of Mitanni, one of the North Syrian countries² Only one mention of this princess exists in contemporary Egyptian records; she was the bride in whose honour Amen-hetep issued one of his sets of commemorative scarabs. They are dated in the tenth year of his reign, and after the name and titles of the King and Queen Thy, the inscription proceeds: "Wonders—they brought to his Majesty the "daughter of Satharna, prince of Ncharina, the lady Gilu"ghipa, and her chief women, 317 in number."

The king of Egypt had obtained the Mitannian princess with difficulty, for although an alliance with Egypt must have been very desirable to the Syrian princes, yet Amen-hetep was obliged to ask several times for Gilughipa's hand. It was only "granted on the seventh time of asking," according to the Babylonian letter which refers to the transaction.

Although the king had been so persistent in desiring the marriage, and had thought the bride's entry into Egypt of sufficient importance to commemorate by special scarabs, yet the lady who entered her husband's land with a retinue of 317 attendants, straightway disappears into the royal harem. She bears no queenly titles, and with the exception of an incidental mention in one or two of the Tel el-Amarna letters, is never again heard of.

¹ A.Z., xviii, 82.

² Babylonian Letters, IV, P.S.B.A., 120; XI, R.P., XV, 79.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

A second king of Mitanni, Dushiatta, was the brother of Gilughipa. In two of his letters on foreign affairs, written to the king of Egypt, Dushratta sends his salutations to his sister, accompanying them by presents of jewellery and of oils. On one occasion the princess' father sent to her a statue of the goddess Ishtar, which arrived in Egypt accompanied by priests, and after a visit of some months returned home. If Gilughipa had adopted the religion of Egypt, she still welcomed the chief deity of her native land when the image was sent to her by Satharna.

One of the later Babylonian letters refers to this sojourn of the goddess Ishtar at the Egyptian court.¹

Gilughipa was by no means the only foreign bride of Amen-hetep. The Tel el-Amarna letters, several of which are the official communications regarding such marriages, show that the royal harem must have been full of these Syrian women. The records prove that Amen-hetep married a daughter of Satharna, a daughter of Dushratta, a sister and a daughter of Kallimasin, and a sister of Buraburiash, kings of Babylonia.

Foreign marriages had long been popular with the Egyptian monarchs, and the position of these princesses in the Pharaoh's household appears to have been an honourable one, their children ranking next only after those of the solar race.

The Babylonian documents referring to these matters are full of interesting information. In one letter, Dushratta reminds the king that not only he, but also his grandfather before him, had each to ask seven times before receiving the Mitannian wives of their choice. This seeming reluctance to bestow the Syrian ladies on the Egyptian monarchs must have been anything but sincere, since the letters of the foreign princes teem with the most evident satisfaction and pride in the alliances with the Pharaonic house.

¹ P.S.B.A., xv, 124.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

These matrimonial occasions are made the pretext for unblushing requests for presents of gold, etc., which are expressed in explicit terms. Dushratta was one of the most grasping, and was loud in his demands concerning the dowry of a daughter whom Amen-hetep married. In a letter written to Amen-hetep's son, Dushratta complains bitterly about certain golden statues promised him by the Egyptian king, who had, however, sent only wooden ones. Dushratta urges the son to make good his father's promise, and he also writes to Queen Thiy, begging her influence in the matter, that the gold statues may be despatched at once.

Another complaint is of the quality of the gold sent as a gift from Egypt. The recipient had measured and found it under weight, and he more than hints at his suspicions that the gift was not gold at all. He is so incensed thereat, that he declines to send the princess whose marriage is in question, and asks to have his presents returned. Another writer begs that the king will himself measure the gold to be sent, and look after its quality.

The letters are childish and naive in their repeated reminders of the number and value of the gifts sent by the writers to the King of Egypt, and loud are the reproaches when the return presents lacked anything in quality or quantity.

Most of these princesses over whom the Pharaohs and their Syrian allies bargained and quarrelled, are nameless ones, appearing in the Tel el-Amarna tablets only as the sister or daughter of such and such a king.

The most interesting of these matrimonial transactions is the tale of a certain princess, about whom there was an extended correspondence, involving much difficulty and recrimination. Kallimasin was the king of Babylonia, whose sister, early in the reign of Amen-hetep III., had left her home to become one of the numerous foreign brides of that monarch. After her departure, all intercourse between herself and her father's house had ceased, nor had she been heard of since. Years passed away, and Amen-hetep became desirous of possessing Kallimasin's young daughter Sukharte, and sent the usual demand for the princess.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Kallimasin was apparently averse to parting with his child, or perhaps was genuinely anxious as to the life that might await her in the far-away harem of the Egyptian king. At any rate, he returned a refusal to Amen-hetep, alleging as a reason his own suspicions regarding the fate of his sister, long since disappeared into the Pharaoh's household, and complained that he did not know if she were alive or dead. Amen-hetep then demanded that a messenger be sent from Chaldea to enquire into the matter, and learn the happy conditions under which the lady was then living. The messengers were sent as desired, but for some reason failed to identify the princess, and returned to their lord without any satisfactory news of his sister.

Kallimasin thereupon communicated to Amen-hetep his belief that the messengers had been imposed on, and that some "ordinary girl of Khanigabbi or of Gagaza or of Ugaret" had been passed off on them as the princess whom they sought, but had not been able to distinguish. To this the Egyptian king responded with some indignation, asking why his good faith should be doubted more than that of other kings to whom Kallimasin's daughters had been given, and why he did not desire to see these, in order to assure himself of their state. "One of the messengers whom Kallimasin had sent was but a shepherd," contemptuously wrote Amen-hetep. "Let some official be sent who had known the princess in youth and could recognize her, and assure the king of his sister's safety."

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Perhaps Amen-hetep had seen the young Sukharte on one of his inspection tours into the Syrian provinces, or else the fame of her charms had in some way reached him, for the heart of the Pharaoh was possessed by the thought of her, and he vehemently pressed his suit, promising to bestow richer gifts than had ever before been sent, and to give to Kallimasin, moreover, an additional present on behalf of the sister for whom his anxiety had been expressed.

No letter exists to show whether Kallimasin sent the older official who succeeded in satisfying him, or whether his fraternal solicitude was set at rest by Amen-hetep's generosity in the way of gifts. As no further reference is made to her in the correspondence, we may take it for granted that Amen-hetep found means to quiet the brother's fears.

The next excuse for not sending Sukharte to Egypt was that she was not old enough, and, besides, Kallimasin himself wanted an Egyptian princess to wife, a request refused by Amen-hetep on the ground that Egyptian princesses had never been given to "a nobody." Sensitiveness seems not to have been a quality entering into the Babylonian character, for Kallimasin did not resent this, but argued the matter, urging that as Amen-hetep was king he could do as he pleased, and no one could criticise the manner in which he chose to bestow the ladies of his family. However, Kallimasin was not particular, and as what he wanted was simply an Egyptian wife, he naively remarks that there must be in Egypt many beautiful women. Let Amen-hetep send him one of these, and "who could say," he adds, "that she is not a princess?" The letter ends with the threat that if Amen-hetep will not accommodate him in this matter, neither shall the Pharaoh have a Babylonian wife.

This seems to have produced the desired result, for another letter from Kallimasin acknowledges with hearty thanks and satisfaction the arrival in Babylonia of the lady sent from Egypt. Apparently, somewhat later, the Babylonian king announces to Amen-hetep that the princess he wished to marry is now of a suitable age, and will be sent to the Pharaoh upon his demand. Valuable gifts were exchanged, and it would seem that this episode in the loves of Amen-hetep came to a happy termination.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

An instance of the leisurely way in which these ancient princes dealt with one another is given at the end of this letter, where Kallimasin hopes that his messenger may soon be sent back, and not detained at the Egyptian court for six years, as the last one had been.

These foreign alliances became so popular, and the Syrian ladies found such favour in the sight of the Pharaohs, that when Amen-hetep's young son arrived at a marriageable age, the king again sent his envoys to Dushratta, to ask for a daughter to become the "Mistress of Egypt." This message evidently referred to a bride for the prince Amen-hetep, and not for the king. The great Queen Thy was living, in the full exercise of her powers, and a second queen could scarcely have divided with her the royal prerogatives.

TADUKHIPA, the princess in question, is mentioned in several of the Tel el-Amarna letters. The first expressed Dushratta's entire willingness to send his daughter to Egypt as soon as her bridal trousseau was ready, which would be in six months' time. Meanwhile the gold sent by Amen-hetep to Dushratta had been found unsatisfactory, in consequence of which Dushratta was inclined to break off the negotiations altogether. As usual in matters of this sort, Dushratta's threat had little sincerity, for a later communication announces the departure of Tadukhipa under an escort from her native land.

She arrived at the Egyptian court, bringing gifts to the Pharaoh from her father, to which was added his blessing, with the hope that the bride would bring every joy to her lord, and that Ishtar and Shamash might make her pleasing in the king's sight.

QUEEN NEFERTITI AND HER CHILDREN.

NEFER-NEFERU-ATEN NEFERTITI.

“The Great Royal Wife, his beloved; “Lady of both Lands; Princess of “North and South; Great Heiress, “living and flourishing for ever
“eternally.”

The queen of Amen-hetep IV. is the only one who ever appears with him as his wife. She is figured by his side in all scenes, domestic and ceremonial, and was the mother of his children. This makes a difficulty concerning Tadukhipa, who was sent for from Mitanni to be the "Mistress of Egypt." But Nefertiti invariably appears as the "Mistress of Egypt," and unless this was purely a conventional title which could be borne by two wives at the same time, it would seem that Nefertiti and Tadukhipa were one and the same person.

The foreign princesses sometimes retained their own names after an Egyptian marriage, as in the case of ¹ Some writers think that she married first Amenhetep III., and later, his son.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT

Amen-hetep's wife Gilughipa ; in other instances they took Egyptian names.¹ The Syrian Tadukhipa might, then, have become Nefertiti when raised to the rank of Queen of Egypt.

On the other hand, Amen-hetep IV., through his mother Thyi, was not of royal origin ; and the traditions of his house would have pointed to the selection of a royal bride, through whom he might strengthen his claim to the throne. It has, therefore, been thought that Nefertiti was the daughter of some princess of the solar race, who was possibly a sister of Amen-hetep III. She appears with the full royal titles of the great queens of the dynasty, whose descendant she may have been. Queenly titles, however, even those of "heiress," and "Lady of both Lands," are not in themselves proof of inherited rights, since they were borne by Queen Thyi, who was of humble origin.

Mr. Petrie explains the conflicting evidences regarding Amen-hetep's queen, by a theory which makes Tadukhipa-Nefertiti the daughter of a royal Egyptian princess, married to one of the Mitannian princes. Tadukhipa would thus come into Egypt a Syrian by birth, and yet inheritor through her mother of the solar rights.² If such an alliance had been made, however, it is difficult to see why Kallimasin did not quote it in answer to the refusal of his request for an Egyptian princess, whom Amen-hetep declined to give "to a nobody."

Perhaps these two queens may be best explained by supposing Nefertiti a princess of the royal house, and Tadukhipa a secondary wife, whose position was not of sufficient rank to include her in the official sculptures of Amen-hetep IV. In this case, the invitation to become the "Mistress of Egypt" could have implied nothing more than a formal compliment.

Whether Nefertiti was then a Syrian princess or an Egyptian, it is certain that she was the beloved and honoured queen of Amen-hetep IV. Shortly after his accession came the great change in the king's religion and policy which led him to abandon Thebes, to establish a new city for the enthronement of Aten, and to change his name from Amen-hetep to Khuenaten. In all of this revolutionary movement the king had the sympathetic support of his powerful mother Thuy and of his queen Nefertiti.

¹ M.'s S.N., 281.

² P., H.E., vol. II, 183.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The graceful figure of his consort often appears in the worship of Aten, who descends in a shower of rays upon her and her children, each ray ending in a tiny hand which rests caressingly upon them. She invariably follows the king, or sits at his side, in all ceremonial scenes, together they receive the court officials, or feast and make merry in company with their children. The domestic life and tastes of the king are prominently brought forward, and everything that Khuenaten did, the queen and children apparently did too. In one instance, Nefertiti is depicted sitting on her husband's knee,¹ a most unusual representation for Egyptian art. Sometimes the royal pair are shown with only one or two daughters, but as time goes on, the number increases until there are six; to this group is added a sister of Queen Nefertiti, the princess Mutnezemet.

Khuenaten's devotion to his family was expressed in terms of the greatest tenderness. From the heights of the steep cliffs beyond the capital city, the king's prayer still cries for blessings on his race: "Sweet love fills my heart for the queen, for her young children. Grant a great age to the queen Nefertiti, in long years may she keep the hand of the Pharaoh. Grant a great age to the royal daughter Merit-aten, and to the royal daughter Makt-aten, and to their children; may they keep the hand of the queen their mother eternally and for ever."²

Nefertiti in turn prays in her lord's behalf: "Grant to thy son who loves thee, life and truth to the lord of the

¹ P., Tel el-A., i, 16; L., D., iii, 99 b.

² Rock inscription near Tel el-Amarna. Transl. BRUGSCH, E.P., 221-223.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"land Khuenaten, that he may live united with thee in "eternity. As for her his wife, the Queen Nefertiti, may
"she live for ever more eternally by his side, well pleasing
"to thee; she admires what thou hast created day by "day."

In addition to the temple of Aten and other buildings which grew up in the new city, Khuenaten erected a palace on the model of that of his father at Thebes, although it was on a vaster scale and the decorations were in a freer and more sumptuous manner. The Cairo Museum has several fine specimens of painted pavements taken from the ruins of this palace.¹ The blocks are decorated with foliage, birds and plants, which glow with life and bear witness to the brilliant artistic achievements of the time.

It was here, amid splendid surroundings, that Queen Nefertiti and the Queen-mother Thy dwelt; a centre about which gathered the court life of the new capital. A gay and happy life it seems to have been, judging from the pleasant scenes of contemporary records. In all ancient art there is no sweeter picture of child life than that left by some admirable artist of the court, which shows two of Nefertiti's little daughters caressing one another as they play by their mother's side.

A curious and amusing reference to Nefertiti occurs in one of the Tel el-Amarna tablets. A letter from Burra-buriash, King of Babylon, had accompanied a present of lapis-lazuli to the Egyptian monarch. Twenty-one pieces of the stone were intended as a gift to the king's "Mistress of the House," i.e., the queen; the smallness of her share of the gift, Burraburiash carefully explained, was because she had shown him no sympathy upon some recent occasion of trouble or illness in his house.

Nefertiti had no son to succeed his father. The six daughters were called respectively: Merit-aten, signifying "Beloved of Aten"; Makt-aten, "Virtue of Aten"; Ankh-es-en-aten, "Aten is her life"; Nefer-neferu-aten, "Beauty of the beauties of Aten"; Nefer-neferu-ra, "Beauty of the beauties of Ra"; and Setep-en-ra, "Chosen of Ra."

¹ Room of the Old Fauna and Flora.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The seventh princess, Bakt-aten, "Servant of Aten," has been included in this family, but is probably the youngest child of Queen Thiy, with whom she appears, being styled a king's daughter, while the children of Khuenaten are always called "daughters of Nefertiti."¹ One of these princesses, Makt-aten, died during her father's reign, and was buried in the king's own tomb, hewn in the cliffs which rise from the desert far behind the royal city.

Two of the daughters married the two succeeding kings of Egypt; while a third became the wife of a Babylonian prince, the son of King Buiraburiash. This princess continued to live at her father's court, and a letter from the Babylonian king mentions a gift which he is sending to his son's wife. This is described as a necklace of great value; the document is unfortunately damaged, which leaves it uncertain whether the numbers "1048" refer to the weight of the necklace,² or to the number of stones composing it.³

The reign of the "heretic king" lasted for seventeen or eighteen years, which is proved by the dates on sealings of wine jars, found amid the mounds of the ruined city. Khuenaten then probably died during his eighteenth regnal year, although no record of his death has survived. His mummy was not among those of the Pharaohs of his house, found at various times by modern explorers; nor up to the present has any trace of it been discovered.

With the death of her husband, Queen Nefertiti also passes into silence, and there is no further mention of her, or of the time of her death; whether she lived on through the reigns of her two sons-in-law, or whether she died before the fall of Aten, there is nothing to show; and the

¹ P., H.E., II, 203, 204.

² Ibid., 269.

³ BUDGE, H.E., IV, 197.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

end of her story, like that of so many other royal women of Egypt, remains untold.

Queen Nefertiti's name is found on many fragments of sculpture, as well as on vases and rings of gold and porcelain. Her portraits are numerous both on stelæ and statues. Of these, the finest one is an admirably executed fragment in the Amherst collection; it has been broken away from the original statue, and consists only of a nose and mouth of great beauty.¹

With Khuenaten's death came the gradual fading of his brilliant dream of a new independent dynasty, dedicated to Aten. Whatever the king's peculiarities, he had a personal force strong enough to carry everything before it, to the point of a complete revolution in the kingdom, in religion, ethics and arts. As soon as the ruling spirit of its creator passed away, the daring creation stood for a short space, slowly tottering to a sure fall, and then collapsed as suddenly as it had come into existence.

MERIT-ATEN, the eldest daughter of the great Enthusiast, had married when very young, Semenkha-Ra, a person whose antecedents are unknown, and who probably based his claim to the throne entirely on his wife's rights. He seems to have been associated for a short time with the reign of his father-in-law. Merit-aten as a child is often found in the family groups of Khuenaten's time, but after her husband's accession, little is known of her. A few rings bearing her name exist;² an altar block was dedicated by her, and she appears with Semenkha-Ra in a tomb which was under construction during Khuenaten's lifetime.

Merit-aten held the dignity of Queen of Egypt for only a few years, which were passed at the palace of her father, and occupied with a last effort to keep alive the expiring flame of Aten-worship. But the struggle was too great;

¹ Pub. by PETRIE, H.E., II, 182.

² P., Tel el-A., xv, 106-7.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

the shoulders on which the burden fell were too feeble to support it, very soon the new king died, and the young queen, leaving no descendants, passed into obscurity. Her years, as computed by Mr. Petrie, could not have exceeded twenty-five.¹ The same fate befell her sister, ANKII-ES-EN-ATEN, who was also very young when she married Tut-ankh-aten.

This prince calls Amen-hetep III. his father, which may possibly mean that he was the son of one of the many foreign wives of that king, he married Khuenaten's third daughter, and through her rights ascended the throne. No sooner had the reign begun, than the new queen saw the final crash of Aten's kingdom, and beheld the erection of her father's devotion and hopes crumble into dust.

The court returned to Thebes; Amen was restored to his supremacy, and his priesthood regained that power which for a moment had been held in check by the daring schemes of a monarch. The Queen's name, bestowed on her in praise of Aten, was changed to Ankhes-en-Amen, at the same time that her husband dropped the Aten termination of his own name; and all traces of the great heresy soon disappeared from the land.

More records survive from this reign than from the last, and in all of these the queen Ankhes-en-Amen appears prominently by her husband's side. Rings and a few other small objects having her name are found; there is no record of any children. The Queen seems to have been only about thirty-one² at the time of her husband's death and her own disappearance from history.

One cannot help wondering what became of these two youthful queens, who at the time of their husband's deaths and their own enforced retirement were still young enough to have had long lives before them. Perhaps they sought a refuge in their father's fallen city, which had not then been entirely abandoned; and, amid the scenes of their childhood, lived on memories of the lost splendours of their house. Daughters of a king who gave to his children an extraordinary devotion; their early youth passed in a brilliant court; both for a time reigning queens; they yet lived to see the kingdom pass to strange hands, and all traces of their own house to vanish.

¹ P., H.E., II, 231.

² Ibid., 232.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The short time of their appearance, and their early exit from the scene, make these two princesses, the last representatives of Khuenaten's ill-fated race, rather pathetic figures in the fading glories of the XVIIIth dynasty.

On the death of Khuenaten's second son-in-law, the throne was ascended by Aÿ, whose queen was named:

TY. It is not known by what means Aÿ made good his claim to the crown. He is identified by Egyptologists with that Aÿ who was Master of the Horse during the time of Khuenaten. Among the courtiers' tombs near the new capital, Aÿ caused a burial place to be made for himself; on the walls of this tomb he recorded his own position as that of "fan-bearer to the king, keeper of the mares, royal scribe, and divine father Aÿ"; while his wife Tÿ was "great nurse, nourisher of the goddess queen, adorer of the king."¹

The position of nurse to the queen was perhaps a high one at court, and it may be that Tÿ had some connection by birth with the royal house. That the "nurse of the queen," and the "keeper of the mares," ascended the Pharaoh's throne at all, is a proof that some sort of claim existed.

After Aÿ became king, he built another tomb at Thebes for himself and his queen. She is there described as "Royal Wife, Great Lady, Princess great of favours, Lady of the two Lands," titles which one is tempted to think were at that time bestowed on every woman who occupied the position of queen-consort, whether she was of royal birth or not.

¹ L., D., iii, 105 f.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The portraits of Tȝ, as shown in the Theban and Tel-el-Amarna tombs,¹ and on a rock shrine at Ekhnim,² give anything but the impression of a royal countenance. The face is more like that of a rather ill-favoured woman of humble origin. It may be presumed that Tȝ was accorded a burial place with her husband in the tomb he had made among the royal ones at Thebes. Perhaps some succeeding occupant of the throne regarded these two personages as intruders into the company of the Pharaohs, for their names are systematically erased from the tomb sculptures. The defacement may be due, however, not to royal command, but to that wanton spirit of destruction which has done so much in modern times to destroy the monuments of Egypt. Except the two instances of Tȝ's appearance in her husband's tomb, and on the Ekhnim stela, there are no traces surviving of her, nor records of any children.

The great dynasty founded by Aahmes the Deliverer was now rapidly nearing its end; and but one more Pharaoh was to ascend the throne before the dawn of a new era under the Rameses. The royal line of conquerors, whose exploits made the dynasty a period of unparalleled brilliancy, was exhausted. After the death of King Aȝ, there was no one to assume the crown but Horemheb, probably the same person as the general of that name who had distinguished himself under the preceding kings. Connected with Horemheb, either as wife or mother, is the last queen known of the XVIIIth dynasty :

MUT-NEZEMET.

"Royal Wife, Lady of both Lands."

This queen is another of the many mysterious figures who appear in Egyptian annals with no definite record by which they can be placed. Horemheb has been supposed a descendant of Thotmes III ; but it is a significant fact that his records appear to base his claim not on this descent, but on some tie connecting him with Mut-nezemet, whose name signifies "the sweet mother"

¹ B., E., 226.

² L., D., iii, 114 d.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

This evidence does not determine the relationship, and may with equal probability make her his mother or his wife. In the sculptures of Khucnaten's time, a sister of Queen Nefertiti is sometimes included in the family group ; she is called Mut-nezemet, and may be the same as the queen of Horemheb's reign.

In such a case she would have been of equal royal birth with Nefertiti, possibly a grand-daughter of Thotmes IV., and it would be plain that her husband or her son would inherit her rights to the crown. Mut-nezemet has been the subject of much discussion.¹ At first she was looked upon as an independent queen, the daughter and successor of Horemheb ; later readings of the monuments concerning her afforded evidence to some writers that she was this king's mother,² and to others that she was his wife.³

The mysterious inscription which proves her importance to Horemheb's succession, and yet withholds her exact position, is unfortunately mutilated. It is written on a granite statue of the king and Mut-nezemet, now in Turin.⁴ The inscription gives a rather puzzling account of Horemheb, which seems to imply that he claimed a divine parentage,⁵ as in the cases of Hatshepsut and of Amen-hetep III. After a laudatory notice of the young prince, his creation and approval by the gods, and his divine appointment to the throne, the following passage occurs :—

¹ ROSELLINI ; CHAMPOLLION.

² BIRCH ; MASPERO

³ LEPSIUS ; WILKINSON ; BRUGSCH ; WIEDEMANN.

⁴ L., T., 1379 ; R., S., xlv, 5, A. ; T.S.B.A., iii, 486.

⁵ M.'s S.N., 342, n. 3.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"Behold this noble Horus desired in his heart to establish his son upon his throne of eternity. Horus proceeded in rejoicing to Thebes, the city of the eternal lord, with his son (i.e., Horemheb) in his embrace, even to Karnak, until he came into the presence of Amen, in order to give him his office as king, to make his length of days. Behold Amen appeared in his noble feast in Southern Thebes, and when he saw the majesty of this god, even Horus and his son with him in the royal entry to give him his office and his throne, then behold Amen-Ra met him in rejoicing . . . he conveyed himself to this chief heir and prince of both lands, Horemheb, he went to the house of the king, going before him to the palace of his great and noble daughter (Mut-nezemet). She made obeisance, she embraced his beauties, she placed herself before him, and all the gods rejoiced at his appearing."

This passage implies that Mut-nezemet was under the protection of Amen. As Horemheb was devoted to the restoration of this god's service, the priesthood probably favoured him as a candidate for the crown, and may have bestowed on him as wife, or even as official wife, the heiress-princess who was Amen's priestess. Or it is possible that Mut-nezemet, being of royal descent, was the wife of a priest of Amen and the mother of Horemheb; and in the scene described on the statue, she perhaps performed some ceremony by which her sovereign rights were formerly conveyed to her son.

If the queen is the same as Nefertiti's sister, Mut-nezemet, a vast change had taken place since the time when the little princess raised her praises to Aten in Khuenaten's devoted groups, to the day when she appears as a devotee of Amen, and the probable wife of his high priest. Many years had passed since Amen's rival had his short-lived triumph, and Mut-nezemet, if identical with Nefertiti's sister, must have been nearly sixty at the time of Horemheb's accession.¹

¹ P., H.E., II, 233.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

She is the only known queen of this reign. Beyond the inscription of the Turin statue, no detailed evidence concerning Mut-nezemet is found, and her representations are few. Her figure is shown with Horemheb on the Turin group, and on the side of the statue she is depicted as a female sphinx. Her name is on a scarab in the Berlin Museum, on a ring in the Petrie collection, and on the figure of a frog in the Cairo Museum.

The chief interest centering in this queen's personality is her identification with a certain colossal head in the Cairo Museum.¹ This magnificent fragment of sculpture was found at Karnak, and was thought by Mariette to be a portrait of Queen Thy, for some years being so labelled in the Museum. Miss Amelia B. Edwards made the suggestion that the head came from some great statue of Queen Hatshepsut. Subsequent excavations at Karnak brought to light some fragments which were believed to be pieces of the body to which this head belonged; the statue is said to represent the goddess Mut.

M. Maspero called attention to its similarity to the fine work of Horemheb's time, and thought it was intended for a likeness of the only queen who appears in his reign. It might still be a portrait of Mut-nezemet, even though under the attributes of a goddess.

This head, whether queen or goddess, is one of the most beautiful productions of Egyptian art. It possesses the dignity, power and repose which are characteristic of the great works of the age. The modelling of the face, the low brows, the long eyes and well-formed nose, and above all the keen vitality of the mouth curved into a haunting smile, make this portrait one of the most distinguished of antiquity. The head is in fine limestone, of a creamy white tint, which gives it a peculiar purity and softness. A second head of the same type was found at Karnak by M. Legrain, in 1904.

¹ Cairo M., Room M, 312.

QUEEN MELENZI (2)

CHAPTER XI.

QUEENS OF THE XIXTH DYNASTY.

Thebes, about 1328 to 1202 B.C.

IN the obscure closing of the XVIIIth dynasty it is difficult to trace the beginning of the XIXth, or the origin of the famous Ramesside family, its sovereign house. The founder of the dynasty, Ramses I., whatever his claim may have been, ascended the throne about 1328 B.C.

Judging from the supremacy of the Egyptian women, and from the instances where other new dynasties were founded on the rights of heiresses of the preceding one, it is probable that Ramses I. claimed his crown through marriage with a descendant of one of the XVIIIth dynasty sovereigns. On the threshold of the new era appears a queen with the titles which usually represented royal inheritance :

SITRA, "the Lady of both Lands, Royal Consort, Royal Mother, Divine Wife."¹ It is quite probable that this princess brought the sovereign rights to the XIXth dynasty, in the same way that Queen Aah-hetep I. bequeathed them to the XVIIIth. Sitra has the title of "Royal Mother" in her own tomb, but the name of her son is not stated. She appears, however, in a second tomb,² that of Seti, the son of Ramses, where she is represented as following immediately after Ramses, and must therefore have been closely related to both kings.³

¹ BRUGSCH and BOURIANT, Livre des Rois

² M., A., i, 32.

³ For various opinions of Sitra's identity, see M.'s P.S.B.A., xi, 190.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

From her presence in Seti's tomb, she is probably to be regarded as the mother of that king, and the queen of Ramses I. It is possible that she was a grand-daughter of Khuenaten, but at present no evidence exists by which her descent may be traced. Seti is the only son known of Ramses I., and presumably of Sitra. In the Valley of the Queens' Tombs at Thebes, Sitra's tomb is found;¹ her portrait² is traced on its walls, and her only other appearance is on the monuments of her son Seti.³

A second descendant of the old royal line of the XVIIIth dynasty, who was connected with the rise of the Ramesside house, was

TUAA, "Great Heiress, Great Royal Wife, Royal Mother."

Her descent, like that of the older queen Sitra, is unknown. Both were probably members of the great Amen-hetep family, of which there must have been many collateral branches.

Tuaa was the queen of Seti, and the mother of his famous son, Ramses the Great. It seems that Ramses I. had held high offices under Horemheb, last king of the XVIIIth dynasty, and had received from that monarch the hand of a royal princess for his son Seti.⁴

If, therefore, Seti's own birth did not entitle him to full royal claims, he at least secured unquestioned sovereign rights to his son Ramses (II.) by marriage with the "great heiress" Tuaa. She is the only queen who appears as the wife of Seti, and is always called the "royal mother" of his son Ramses.

There are several portraits of Tuaa, the best one probably being a statue which is now in the Vatican.⁵ A second statue of the queen was found at Medinet Habu;⁶

¹ C, N., i, 394; L., D.T., iii, 235.

² R., S., V, 19.

³ M., A., i, 32; M.A.F., ii, iii, 178-81.

⁴ M.'s S.N., 369, n. 3.

⁵ Mon. Inst., ii, 40; Annales, ix, 167.

⁶ L., D.T., iii, 148.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

she accompanies the colossi at the rock temple of Abu Simbel;¹ and is portrayed on a recut statue from Tanis, which is now in the Cairo Museum. Mr. Petrie says of it: "An old seated figure of a XIIth dynasty princess at Tanis was reworked, the face altered, the head-dress recut, and the thumbs narrowed, while the re-attribution of it to "Tuaa was put on the side."²

The queen's name also occurs at the Ramesseum,³ at Tanis;⁴ on stelæ with her son Ramses;⁵ and on a granite paint palette in the British Museum.⁶ Queen Tuaa was the mother of at least two of Seti's children, Ramses, and a princess Hent-ma-ra, who appears with her mother on the Vatican statue.

The tomb of Seti's queen is unknown, and her mummy was not found with those of her husband and son in the great cachette of Deir el-Bahari. It is a curious fact that the body of so important a person as this ancestress of the Ramessides should not have been hidden away by those care-takers who were at such pains to conceal the other members of her family. The absence of Tuaa's mummy suggests that it had already disappeared at the time when the royal dead were removed to the obscure tomb at Gurnah.

On the death of Seti, the crown was assumed by Ramses II., who took possession of the land with a thoroughness never before displayed by any king of Egypt. There is scarcely an important site in the country which does not show the monuments of Ramses, either as an original builder, a restorer, or, as in many cases, a mere usurper of the works of his predecessors.

The nature of his exploits as they appear in contemporary records, and the importance of his many monuments

¹ L., D., iii, 297, 55; B., E., 373.

² P., H.E., III, 26; P., Tanis, 1, 6-7, pl. ii, 11, 12; xiv, 1.

³ Q., R., xxix.

⁴ Rec., ix, 18.

⁵ MIRAMAR, 1152.

⁶ P., H.E., iii, 9. A mutilated statue of this queen is in the portico of the Cairo Museum.

QUEEN NUBKHEPERRE-INTEF

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is to Nefertari, rather than to her sister queens, that the king's records give the most important place.¹ She appears to have been his sister,² and heiress of the kingdom through their mother, Queen Tuaa. Nefertari had been married to Ramses while he was crown prince, both being very young; in his first regnal year, she was already his queen, a fact proved by the tomb inscriptions of Nebunnef, a high priest of Amen at Thebes.

For the first few years of Ramses' reign, his youthful queen appears on the monuments side by side with the king, as sharer of the throne. The prominence which he thus gives her, implies either that the queen's high rank forced him to recognise her equality, or else that he gave to his beautiful wife an affection which delighted in honouring her.

It is not known for how many years Nefertari shared the brilliant reign of her husband, nor how many of Ramses' numerous children were also hers. She was certainly the mother of his ninth son Seti, and a prince Anuber-rekhu, whose exact position is not indicated; neither of these sons ascended the throne, although Seti was living in the 53rd year of his father's reign. Two of Ramses' daughters may also be the children of Nefertari. This is suggested by the figures of the princesses, Meryt-amen, and Hent-taui, placed one on either side of the queen at Abu Simbel.³ This temple is the most important monument on which Nefertari is represented, and it is likely that she would there be accompanied by her own children.

The princess Meryt-amen was a royal heiress, and in the Luxor list of the family her name is inserted with that of Nefertari;⁴ this is possibly the same princess who, as the daughter of Ramses' chief queen, would be apt to have her mother's name.

¹ WIEDEMANN, A.G., 463-4.

² M.'s S.N., 386; BUDGE, H.E., V, 69.

³ B., U.E., 337.

⁴ P., H.E., III, 37.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The luxurious ease of life which the court of Ramses and Nefertari enjoyed is expressed by a contemporary record;¹ the writer, Panbesa, describes the richness of the Delta, where Ramses had founded a new capital: "The people are joyful and festive; the virgins of Aa-nekhtu are well clad every day, sweet oil on their heads with fresh cuils; they stand at their doors, their hands adorned with nosegays and flowers, to welcome the king. Sweet wines and syrups and beer abound; and sweet singers as at Memphis, amid ceaseless joys."

To the indefatigable building spirit of Ramses, and to the ambition which glorified his reign with countless memorials, we owe one of the most impressive monuments of Egypt. In Nubia, the great temple of Abu Simbel was hewn from a rocky cliff which rises abruptly from the river; the façade of living rock was cut into the semblance of giant forms, the four seated colossi having the features of Ramses.

To the north of this temple is a smaller one similar in construction. The façade is formed by the figures of six colossi, two of which represent Nefertari wearing the horned disc crown, and holding in one hand a sistrum.² The temple is dedicated by the³ "King Ramses and his Great Consort Nefertari-meri-en-mut, who have made the temple in the holy mountain" to the honour of the goddess Hathor. The greatness of the undertaking was fully realised by the royal builder, who says: "His Majesty has commanded to make a temple in the land of Khent, in an excavation in the mountain; never was such a thing done before."

The graceful figure of Nefertari occurs several times in the Hathor temple, sculptured in low-relief. The artist has skilfully drawn a tall slender woman of gracious presence,

¹ Panbesa Pap. Anast., iii; P., H.E., iii, 74.

² L., D., iii, 192.

³ B., U.E., 388.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

who is described as "The Lady of the North and South ; The Priestess of Hathor, Mut, and Anuke."¹

The queen is further depicted with Ramses at Abu Simbel in several scenes of the great temple,² on stelæ³, and with the colossi.⁴ In the temple of Luxor, several of the king's statues are also accompanied by small well-modelled figures of Nefertari. She likewise appears on the famous Turin monument of Ramses, which is the finest existing statue of the reign.⁵

Other representations of the royal consort are found among the rock shrines of the Gebel Silsileh,⁶ where she adores the gods Taurt, Tahuti, and Mut. She is mentioned in various inscriptions of private individuals. Her statue in black granite is in the Vatican collection,⁷ and several small objects are known which are connected with her memory. Among these a carnelian statuette is in the Louvre,⁸ while an alabaster vase mounted in gold,⁹ the base of a statue¹⁰ and several scarabs are in other collections.

From the monuments of the latter part of Ramses' reign, Nefertari's name is absent. Considering the importance of her position at the time when the temple of Abu Simbel and the colossi of Luxor were carved, her disappearance from the later monuments probably means that she died before they were sculptured.

After her death, Queen Nefertari was worshipped as a divine Osirian, or a soul which had become deified, and under the attributes of Osiris, Lord of the dead, was adored as a god.¹¹ Her tomb was discovered by Schiaparelli in 1904 in the Valley of the Queens' Tombs at Thebes.

¹ P., H.E., iii, 83.

² C., N., V, 3, 4 ; VI, 1, 2, 4 ; VII, 12 ; VIII, 1, 2.

³ L., D., iii, 189 b.

⁴ B., E., 373.

⁵ L., D., iii, 297, 58.

⁶ L., D., iii, 175 c.

⁷ P., H.E., iii, 35.

⁸ L.M., s, h.

⁹ F.P. Coll.

¹⁰ N., Y, 65.

¹¹ L., K., xxii. LEPSIUS' List of Osirians.

QUIN NUTRIARI-MERI-LX-MU

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It consists of several small chambers decorated with paintings, in which the figure of Nefertari often occurs. The colours are as brilliantly fresh as though only a few days had passed instead of 3,200 years since they were first laid on the walls. But the work, although very elaborate, is poor and coarse. The tomb had been rifled and was empty.

Although little is known of the life of this heiress of Egypt, yet she above all other queens of the land was accorded a memorial which in its unique character has no equal—the temple of Hathor at Abu Simbel. From the rocky face of the mountain the two great statues of Nefertari stand on either side of the temple entrance, and Ramses' inscription proclaims, "the Great Princess of every grace in her heart; the beloved palm; Mistress of both Lands; beloved of the King, and united with the Ruler."¹

AST-NEFERT, "Great Royal Wife," was a second queen of Ramses II., and probably also his sister.² As she was the mother of his eldest daughter and of the second son, she was contemporary with Nefertari. The two queens must have been married to Ramses at about the same time, and the rank of their children show their equality of birth.

Ast-nefert occupies a less prominent place on Ramses' monuments than her sister, which is puzzling, as Ast-nefert was mother of the king's chief heiress daughter and of the son who for many years occupied the position of royal heir. Possibly Nefertari was the elder of the two sisters, or was possessed of a greater personal charm, as suggested by her portraits. Her seniority of birth, or the high place she may have held in her husband's affections, would account for her more frequent appearance on his monuments.

¹ B., U.E., 338.

² M.'s S.N., 386; WIEDEMANN, A.G., 463-4; BUDGE, H.E. V, 69.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The children of Ast-nefert were Ramses, second son of the king; Khaemuas,¹ fourth son, and royal heir at the time of his death in the 55th year of his father's reign; Merenptah, the thirteenth son and successor of Ramses; and Bant-anta, the eldest daughter.

With these children the royal mother is figured on several monuments at Silsileh.² Although in two instances, at Aswan³ and Silsileh, she accompanies Ramses as his queen, yet she has no place in the great works at Abu Simbel, where Nefertari alone appears with the king. One or two small memorials of Ast-nefert are known. A group in the Louvre shows her with her sons,⁴ and a scarab mentioned by Petrie gives her name.⁵

BANT-ANTA; MERYT-AMEN; NEBT-TAUI.

These three princesses were the great heiress daughters of Ramses and his queens. Their tombs are in the Valley of the Queens' Tombs, where they each have the titles, "Royal Daughter, Lady of both Lands," and "Great Royal Wife."

From the later title it has been generally supposed that Ramses, in addition to his other queens, married these three princesses, his own daughters.⁶ As this opinion rests on the value of a title, it may be permissible to suggest a different interpretation of the position of these women. At least one example is known where the title "Royal Wife" could only have been used as an honorary one. This was the case of a daughter of King Aahmes I. of the XVIIIth dynasty, where the princess Sat-amén, although an infant, was described as "Royal Wife."⁷

¹ L., D., iii, 174 e, 175 e, h, and Lists.

² C., M., 120 a, 103, iii.

³ L., D., iii, 175 h.

⁴ P., L., 633.

⁵ P., H.Sc., 1610.

⁶ E. DE ROUGÉ, Lectures; WIEDEMANN, A.G., 466; MASPERO, S.N., 424; PETRIE, H.E., iii, 88.

⁷ See page 68.

PRINCESS BANIANIA

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Bant-anta heads the list of Ramses' daughters, and was therefore the eldest. She was, moreover, the child of Queen Ast-nefert, and in consequence an heiress.

The other two, Meryt-amen and Nebt-tai, may easily have been also the daughters of Ast-nefert or of Nefertari, their mother's name not being mentioned. These three princesses, together with a fourth, Ast-nefert, who was not improbably the child of Queen Ast-nefer, seem to have been the only ones of Ramses' fifty-nine daughters who bore the queenly titles "Lady of both Lands, and Great Royal Wife."

Supposing these four princesses to have been the offspring of Ramses' two queens, they would be the only female members of his enormous family who as royal heiresses would have the right to the hereditary titles. These they may have assumed from their earliest years as a birthright, and as the intended spouses of their elder brothers. In this possible case, the title "Royal Wife" would not have a literal meaning, but would be a formal insignia of rank, distinguishing the daughters of queens of the Pharaonic house from those who were the children of foreign wives or of slaves.

Bant-anta seems to have been of especial importance. She may even have been the wife of her brother Khaemuas, for many years his father's heir. As he was the fourth son, and Bant-anta the eldest daughter, of 162 children, they were probably of suitable age, and it seems more than likely that the heir and chief heiress would have been united.

Bant-anta's portrait occurs on a statue of her father at Memphis, which represents her with a beautiful face of extreme youth. She is often figured in the rock sculptures of Aswan and Silsileh;¹ with her mother on the colossi of Abu Simbel;² in the family lists;³ and on statues at

¹ L., D., iii, 174 ε, 175 η.

² B., U.E., 373.

³ Rec., xvi, 32; L., K., xxii.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Karnak,¹ Luxor, Sinai, and Tanis.² Her tomb is in the Valley of the Queens, and has been published by Champollion and Lepsius.³

Meryt-amen is fourth in the list of daughters at Luxor,⁴ and fifth at Abu Simbel;⁵ she appears on statues at Abu Simbel⁶ and at Tanis;⁷ and a vase in the Louvre⁸ and some scarabs bear her name. A statue of the princess' tutor, represents Meryt-amen on his knees.⁹ Her tomb among those of the Queens at Thebes, has a hall and three chambers, the tomb shaft being at the left of the entrance.¹⁰ Her portrait,¹¹ in which she wears the vulture head-dress, has a pleasant face, curiously like that of her great-grand-mother, Queen Sitra.

Nebt-taui is on the colossi of Abu Simbel,¹² and in the Derr list of daughters.¹³ Like her two sisters, she had a tomb at Thebes;¹⁴ and with them was exalted after death to the company of the blessed Osirians, who were worshipped.¹⁵

The third known queen of Ramses II. was a foreign princess,

MAAT-NEFERU-RA, the daughter of the Prince of the Kheta. The power of these ancient enemies of Egypt appears to have so nearly equalled that of the Pharaohs, that Seti and his son found it more profitable to make peace with a strong foe than to continue the old wars.

An alliance with the Kheta was therefore formed, and ratified by Ramses, in his twenty-first year. The terms of peace were scrupulously observed by the two monarchs, and a few years later the Khetan chief arrived at the court of the Pharaoh on a friendly visit.

¹ C., N., ii, 23.

² P., T., i, 24.

³ L., D., iii, 172 e; L., D.T., ii, 227; C., N., i, 401-2.

⁴ Rec., xvi, 32.

⁵ L., D., iii, 186.

⁶ B., E., 377.

⁷ P., T., i, 35.

⁸ P., L., 377.

⁹ Cairo M., Room P., 560.

¹⁰ L., D., iii, 172 d; L., D.T., ii, 227.

¹¹ L., D., iii, 298.

¹² B., E., 373.

¹³ L., D., iii, 184.

¹⁴ L., D., iii, 172 f; L., D.T., ii, 228.

¹⁵ L., K., xxii.

QUEEN MAAT NEFKU KA

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

He came in state, and brought with him so large a retinue, that when they reached the Egyptian frontier, the governor, fearing an enemy, refused to let the travellers enter the country until the matter had been reported to the king. Ramses at once sent his nobles and an escort to welcome the royal visitors, and the Khetan chief, accompanied by his eldest daughter, and bringing valuable presents of gold, silver, and horses, made a triumphal entry into the city of Ramses, where the king was then in residence.

The stela recording this visit purports to be a conversation between the god Ptah and his son Ramses, to whom the deity says: "The people of Kheta are subjects of thy palace . . . while they humbly approach thy person with their productions. . . . All their property is brought to thee His eldest daughter stands forward at their head, to soften the heart of King Ramses. A great inconceivable wonder! She herself knew not the impression which her beauty made on thy heart."¹

The Khetan prince is represented in his native dress, but the princess who precedes her father, wears the costume of the women of Egypt, and has on her head the vulture and uræus crown.² Ramses was at that time over fifty years of age, and had, besides his two sister queens, a large harem; nevertheless, he married the young foreigner whose beauty had so impressed him, and gave her the title of queen,³ with a new name Maat-neferu-Ra, i.e., "beholding the beauties of the sun." Her own name was not stated. The stela which records the marriage of Ramses with the Khetan princess is cut on the south side of the court of the great temple at Abu Simbel.⁴

The queen Maat-neferu-Ra appears on one of the statues of Ramses found at Tanis,⁵ and on a plaque from

¹ BRUGSCH, E.P., 294.

² L., D., iii, 196.

³ M.'s S.N., 406.

⁴ L., D., iii, 196 a; Rec., xviii, 164-6.

⁵ MARIETTE, Rec., ix, 13; ROUGE, I.H.E., lxxiv, j.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Tell el-Yehudiyeh.¹ No further particulars are known regarding the young foreign queen at the court of Ramses, and her tomb has not been found.

Ancient tradition as well as modern investigation² have identified Ramses II. with the Pharaoh who oppressed the children of Israel in Egypt. It would therefore have been at this time that, according to the Biblical narrative, Moses was placed in an ark of bulrushes, and found in the Nile by "Pharaoh's daughter." The princess who found the child in the river when she went to bathe, took compassion on him and adopted him, would have been one of the 59 daughters of Ramses. Brugsch suggests her identification with one of the youngest of these children, called Meri, as "her name reminds us of the princess "Merris, the daughter of Maat-neferu-Ra, the Kheta: "princess, who, according to Jewish tradition, found Moses "when she went to bathe."³

"THE WHITE QUEEN."

It is under this designation that Mr. Petrie places the fine statue of an unrecorded queen, who is known in the Cairo Museum as "A Wife or Daughter of Ramses II."⁴

On the plain adjoining the necropolis at Thebes, close by the Ramesseum, are the ruins of several funeral temples; in one of these, with no name by which to identify it, a beautiful bust in white limestone was found lying by itself. The mutilated inscription contained only priestess' titles. The bust represents a queen wearing the crown, a curled wig, necklace and ornaments; the wig has been painted blue, and the ornaments are yellow. In the ears are large round earrings like those worn by Ramses' queen Nefertari and his daughter Bant-anta. The face has great charm, although the nose is missing; the style is realistic, and the personality of the nameless queen is unusually winning.

¹ P., H.Sc., 1603.

² BRUGSCH, E.P., 301, 309.

³ M's S.N., 442, ns. 2 and 3.

⁴ Cairo M., Room P, 313.

"THE WHITE QUEEN"

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Mr. Petrie thought that the site of the temple in which the statue was found, pointed to the XVIIIth dynasty for its origin ; but from other indications was inclined to see in the "White Queen" one of the great Theban rulers of the XXVIth dynasty. The titles engraved on the back of the figure show that the princess held high offices in the service of the gods, these offices being designated by various musical instruments, which show her to have been "The player of the Sistrum of Mut," etc.¹

The reign of Ramses II. came to an end after having lasted for sixty-seven years,² the monarch then dying at the age of eighty-five. Many of the elder royal heirs had died during their father's long life, and the crown descended to his thirteenth son, Merenptah.

This king chose for his consort one of his sisters, a royal heiress,

AST-NEFERT, probably the ninth daughter of Ramses' family. She appears on the rock tablets of the Gebel Silsileh³ with the title, "Lady of both Lands."

As already noticed, she is one of the four princesses who alone of Ramses' 59 daughters is known to have had the titles of royal inheritance. As Ast-nefert is the only queen who is named with Merenptah, she was probably the mother of his two children, Seti (II.), and a princess Arit-nefert.

After Merenptah's death, the latter part of the XIXth dynasty was filled by the short reigns of four kings, Seti II., Amenmeses, Siptah and Setnekht, the exact order of whose succession and relationship is not entirely clear. Owing to a confusion of recut cartouches in a usurped tomb, it has been held by some writers that Siptah was Merenptah's immediate successor, and that Seti II. followed Siptah. The evidence seems rather to be in favour of Seti II. as the heir of Merenptah.

¹ PETRIE, Six Temples, 22.

² M.'s S.N., 421.

³ C., M., 114, 121.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The statue, No. 633, in the Cairo Museum, represents Merenptah with his son Seti by his side ;¹ a stela of Seti's son was usurped by Siptah,² who, moreover, used old wine-jars of Seti in his temple deposit. These facts seem to make reasonable the supposition that Merenptah's son and successor was Seti II., who numbered in his family, besides Amenmeses, the other kings whose brief reigns concluded the dynasty.

TA-KHAT, who was Seti's wife, was the mother of Amenmeses, in whose tomb she appears as, " Divine Mother, the Great Royal Mother."³

A red granite colossus of Seti gives the name of his queen, accompanied by the titles, " Royal Daughter, Great Royal Wife, united to her Horus."⁴ An ostrakon in the Louvre⁵ contains a list of Ramses' daughters, one of the last names being Ta-khat ; from which evidence it has been supposed that this young daughter of Ramses married her nephew Seti II., and is the same as the queen Ta-khat, mentioned on his statue.⁶

The queen's parentage, however, is not stated, and she may as well have been the child of Merenptah as of Ramses. There would seem to be good reasons for supposing her parents to have been Merenptah and Ast-nefert. Ta-khat is the only known queen of Seti II. His daughter was probably Tausert, a great " Heiress Queen," a heritage which by law she must have had from her mother. This mother in turn must have been of full royal blood in order to transmit such rights ; but neither of Ramses' sister-queens married in his youth could well have been the mother of a 58th daughter of that king.

If, then, Ta-khat was the child of Ramses, her mother would have been a secondary wife or slave, and would have

¹ MASPERO, Q.G., p. 163 ; NAVILLE, Bubastis, 45.

² P., S.T., 15.

³ L., D., iii, 202.

⁴ Cairo M., North Portico, 392.

⁵ No. 2261 ; Rec. xvi, 67.

⁶ P., H.E., iii, 120.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

had no rights to bequeath to her daughter. If, on the other hand, Ta-khat was born of Ast-nefert and Merenptah, she would be the legal heiress, and the subsequent royal claims of her daughter Tausert would be the natural result of her position. In the light of the only evidence at present available, the demands of the Egyptian rule of female succession seem to make Ast-nefert the daughter of one of Ramses' queens; Ast-nefert's daughter being Ta-khat and Ta-khat's heiress, Tausert.

The only son definitely recorded as born of Ta-khat is Amenmeses, who succeeded Seti II. The queen of Amenmeses was

BAKT-URNURO, who has left no trace in the annals of the house, except the record of her name and position in her husband's tomb.¹

The confusion in the history of the reigns of Seti's heirs seems to have been due to difficulties which arose regarding the succession. A family quarrel apparently resulted, which, as Petrie remarks, was almost the tale over again of the Thotmes and Hatshepsut.² That queen's counterpart in the later feud was SIT-RA MERY-AMEN TAUSERT.

" Lady of both Lands, Princess of the " North and South, The Great Royal Lady."

This heiress of the kingdom claimed the crown of the Pharaohs as her birthright. The sovereigns who succeeded ¹ L., D., iii, 202 g; M.A.F., iii, pl. 56.

² P., H.E., iii, 123.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Seti II. were Amenmeses, Siptah and Tausert;¹ the assumption of royal authority by the princess, may possibly be the clue to the troubles which followed, and which soon brought the country to a state bordering on anarchy.

Like the queen Hatshepsut, Tausert seems to have been associated with her father on the throne. Upon Seti's death, his son Amenmeses apparently succeeded in thrusting the queen temporarily from the throne, and in gaining the sole power. His triumph was but short lived; for whether Tausert's cause was too strong for his resistance, or whether he was conveniently removed by death, it seems that after a reign of only about a year's duration, the queen's rival disappeared.²

She then re-assumed control of the government, in connection with her younger brother Siptah, whom she probably married. She revenged herself on Amenmeses, whom she must have regarded as a usurper, by erasing the cartouches from his tomb.³

At Thebes, the queen began the building of a temple, which was left unfinished, if indeed anything more than the foundations were ever constructed. On the site, nine foundation deposits were found. These consisted of stone tablets having Tausert's cartouches; scarabs and pottery; glazed figures of ducks, fish, lotus-flowers, bullocks and bulls' heads, etc.; besides rings and copper models of tools.⁴

The only dated record of Tausert's reign is an ostrakon of her eighth year.⁵ Her husband's last known date is in a sixth year; Tausert may, then, have reigned alone for two years after Siptah's death, or she may have reckoned her

¹ The conclusions drawn by Petrie, from existing evidence, make Tausert, Amenmeses and Siptah all children of Seti II P., H.E., iii, 120.

² P., H.E., iii, 126.

³ M.A.F., iii, 81; L., D., iii, 202 e, f, g.

⁴ P., S.T., xvi, xvii, xix; P., H.E., vol. III, 128.

⁵ DARESSY, Ostraka, 25293; C., M

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

own reign from the time of its association with that of her father. In the latter case, Tausert and Siptah would have ceased to rule at the same time.

Manetho's list names the queen Thuo¹is, and attributes to her a reign of seven years, an additional proof of the early disappearance of Seti's heiress.

In these few data are all the elements of a stirring drama, not without a suggestion of tragedy. Within the short space of eight years,¹ we find no fewer than four reigns: a dominating princess who claims the right to active government, an elder brother who wrenches the sceptre from her grasp; his speedy exit by fair means or foul; the queen's restoration, and a joint rule with a second brother lasting only a few years, when they are both superseded by a fourth claimant.

We have in the erased cartouches of Amenmeses, Siptah, and Tausert, the evidences of hatred and revenge; and finally there is the suggestion of a violent end, in the abrupt termination of the joint reign of Tausert and Siptah, both sovereigns being in the prime of life, and both leaving temples which were only in the early stages of construction.

The last act in this unknown drama was performed by Setnekht, or Ramses III., who usurped their tomb and erased the cartouches. The tomb of Queen Tausert² was not made in that valley where lay the earlier queens of her house, but was situated among the tombs of the kings of Egypt, with whom she had claimed a place in life, and with whom she chose to rest after death. The tomb is known as No. 14, in the Bibân el Molûk. It originally consisted of a hall and two chambers, sculptured with representations of the queen and Siptah. A scarab exists which also unites the names of the two sovereigns.

¹ P., H.E., III, 122.

² L., D., iii, 201 a; L., D.T., ii, 212; C., N., 1, 448, 806; M.A.F., iii, 123.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The foundation plan of Siptah's temple,¹ shows it to have been less than a third the size of that of his queen. It is perhaps a significant sign of the spirit of a degenerating age, that the builder of a small and unimportant temple should have provided for its foundation, eight lavish deposits, consisting of "about 150 glazed plaques and "scarabs, 230 rings, 100 gold and silver foil plaques; over "1,200 glazed models and rings; about 150 copper models of tools, besides pottery, stone mortars, etc."²

The last one of the personages engaged in the family feuds of Seti II. was Setnekht, who ascended the throne on the death or disappearance of Tausert and Siptah.

THYI-MERENAST was the queen of Setnekht. Her name suggests the old royal line of the XVIIIth dynasty; but her descent is unknown.

She was the mother of Ramses III., the founder of the XXth dynasty. Her relationship to these two kings is established by the stela of a priest, Merenatef, found at Abydos. The sculpture shows this priest in adoration before Setnekht and Thyi-merenast, with their son Ramses III., making offerings.³ In tomb No. 11 of the Queens' Tombs, the figure of the queen-mother of Ramses III. appears, followed by her son. The tomb was, therefore, probably that of Thyi-merenast, although the name of the owner can no longer be deciphered from the inscriptions.⁴

In Ramses' laudatory memorial of his father Setnekht, he speaks of that king as a saviour of his country, and gives a dark summary of the state of Egypt during the troubled years when the heirs of Seti II. were struggling for the throne. "The land of Egypt was overthrown. Every man "was his own guide, they had no superiors. From the "abundant years of the past we had come to other times.

¹ The remains of the temples of Tausert and Siptah were excavated by PETRIE in 1896. They are described by him in Six Temples, etc.

² P., H.E., III, 132.

³ M., A., II, 52.

⁴ L., D., III, 217 e, f.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"The land of Egypt was in chiefships and in principedoms; each killed the other among noble and mean."¹

From this state of lawlessness, the kingdom was redeemed, according to Ramses, by his father Setnekht. If this account is true, Setnekht must have been a ruler of extraordinary ability, to have accomplished so great a work of regeneration in his short reign, which does not seem to have lasted for much more than a year.

Queen Thyi-meinast's brief appearance on the throne of Egypt has left few memorials. Besides the tomb and the Abydos stela before mentioned, her name and figure occur in two re-used pavement slabs at Abydos². The stela of Merenatef shows this queen as a graceful figure with extended arms holding two sistra which she apparently sounds before the gods.

¹ Harris Papyrus, 75, trs. BIRCH.

² P., H.E., III, 136.

CHAPTER XII.

QUEENS OF THE XXTH DYNASTY.

Thebes. From about 1200 to 1100 B.C.

THIS dynasty was founded by Ramses III., whose brilliant reign left many memorials throughout the kingdom. After this one vigorous monarch, the history of the dynasty is an account of the waning fortunes of the Ramesside family, which weakened and degenerated until its power fell before the priestly dynasty of Thebes.

AST-AMASERETH, "Royal Wife, Great Lady, Lady of the two Lands," was the Queen of Ramses III. She appears on a statue of the king,¹ and is probably the same as the Queen Ast, mentioned on a stela of an official,² Amenemapt, and in the Queens' Tombs, where No. 10 seems to have belonged to Queen Ast, "Great Royal Mother" of Ramses VI, who was a son of Ramses III.³ She is also mentioned in the Abbott Papyrus.⁴ A "Royal Mother," Humazery, who appears in a mutilated inscription of Ramses VI at Gurnah,⁵ may be a second queen of Ramses III.; as, however, Queen Ast appears from her tomb to have been the mother of Ramses VI., it seems probable that Humazery, Ast, and Ast-amasereth, are all one and the same person—the chief queen of Ramses III., whose Egyptian name Ast adds the Syrian one, Amasereth. Brugsch gives her father as Hebuan-rozcnath, and suggests that Ramses, like many of his predecessors, had chosen a foreign princess to share his crown.⁶

¹ L., D., iii, 207 g.

² L., D., iii, 224 a.

³ L., D.Z., ii, 101.

⁴ Berlin, 3422.

⁵ R.P., xii, 109.

⁶ BRUGSCH, E.P., 342.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

As the monuments of Ramses give ten sons, beside the portraits of 22 nameless princes and princesses, it is possible that the king had more than one "Great Royal Wife," and that the Ast-humazery of the records of Ramses VI., is a different person from the Ast-amascrcth who figures as queen-consort on the statue of the king at Cairo.

A further mention of Ramses' queen is found in the Abbott Papyrus, where during the official inquiry under Ramses X. into the robberies of royal tombs, a thief confessed to having broken into the tomb of Queen Ast. This was afterwards proved to be a mistake, as the queen's tomb on examination was found intact.¹

It was against one of the sons of the queen that the famous harem conspiracy of this reign was formed. Ramses had a secondary wife or concubine, Thi by name, who was evidently a woman of strong will and unprincipled determination; she had, moreover, a high ambition for her son, who, being the child of a slave, could not hope to inherit his father's crown. She therefore plotted the murder or dethronement of Ramses and his legitimate heir. The power of Thi's influence, and perhaps also the unpopularity of the king, induced many high officials of the court, including councillors, stewards, secretaries, land surveyers, women of the royal harem, attendants and servants, to conspire together against the life and crown of their sovereign.

Thi hoped to stir up such a revolt against Ramses as to overthrow his government, and to place her son, the prince who is mentioned as Pentaurt, on the throne. The numerous officials and members of the harem who joined the conspiracy had doubtless many acts of oppression to revenge on a king who, to judge from his sculptures and the actual features of his mummy, may well have been both a brutal and a selfish master.

¹ Abbott Pap., R.P., xii, 109.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The plot of Thi and her son included the use of magic, whereby certain wax figures and amulets were supposed to alienate such servants of the king as remained faithful, or to cause the monarch's death by disease. The charms failing, one of the conspirators, through compunction or fear, revealed the plot to Ramses, who caused the arrest of all the accused, and appointed a court of twelve judges to try the prisoners and award their punishment.

Three reports of this famous conspiracy remain;¹ the "Judicial Papyrus" of Turin, and the papyri of Lee and Rollin. The court was charged to pursue the inquiry with vigour, and they therefore tried, and apparently condemned, all of the accused. The "chief culprit," Beka-kamen, house steward, was "brought up because of actual participation in the doings of the wife Thi, and the women of the harem." Fourteen other "chief culprits," the councillors, secretaries and land surveyors "of the harem for the service of the women's house," were each "set before the elders of the judgment-seat. They judged his offence; they found him guilty, and awarded him his punishment."

Six women attached to the harem were also found guilty and punished. Ten officials who were "set before the elders of the judgment-seat to be tried" were found guilty. "They laid them down before the tribunal. They died by their own hand." The captain of the foreign legion of the "Cushi," who had received a message regarding the revolt from his sister in the harem, was likewise tried and condemned.

In all, six women and forty men were found guilty of crime against the Pharaoh, and suffered the penalty for treason, some of them for only having been aware of the plot without revealing it. No reference is made to punishments which may have been meted out to the women of the harem, and to the leader of the conspiracy, "the wife

¹ Pub. and trans. by DÉVÉRIA, 1868; later by LEPAGE-RENOUF in R.P., 1st Series, vol. viii, 53-65.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Thi," on whom the chief responsibility of the plot lay. If she endured no other penalty, she had at least the sorrow of knowing that the schemes for her son's advancement had resulted only in bringing him to trial and to death. "Pentaurt, who is also known by another name, was brought up because of his actual participation with his mother Thi, made with the women of the harem, and because of the crime which was to have been committed against their lord; having been judged by the councillors, they found him guilty, they laid him down where he stood. He died by his own hand." This phrase, also translated "they died of themselves," has been understood to mean a forced suicide, by which public execution was avoided.

It is just possible that a ghastly memorial of this conspiracy still exists. Among the mummies of the Ramesside house, there was found one which had no inscriptions on its wrappings, and lay in a plain unmarked coffin. The mummy was examined with startling results; the body had not been prepared in the usual way before wrapping; the viscera were not removed; the hands and feet were strongly bound together, and a layer of natron had been laid over the skin; after which the body had been hastily wound, and the whole sewed up in a sheep-skin.

The state of the mummy, and contortion of the face, suggest that the man was a criminal, who died from the effects of a powerful poison; or who suffered the dreadful fate of having been "invested while still alive, with the wrappings of the dead."² This nameless mummy, found without inscription among the family of the Ramses, may have been Pentaurt, the traitor of the house of Ramses III., who, after suffering for his crime, was laid to rest with his fathers.

The king reigned for thirty-six or thirty-seven years. His great memorial is the so-called Harris Papyrus,³ 133

¹ M.'s S N, 479.

² MASPERO, Mumies Royales de Deir el-Bahari, 548; S.N., 480.

³ B.M., BIRCH.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

feet in length, which recounts the king's achievements, and describes the state of Egypt as one of rare prosperity and peace. The papyrus gives a pleasant picture of the country at this time: "I made to be planted the entire land with trees in leaf. I let the people sit in their shade. I let the women of Egypt walk out to the place she wished, no vile persons molested her on her way."¹

NUBKHESDEB was the wife of Ramses VI. and the mother of his daughter Ast. A stela from Koptos² contains the figure of this princess Ast, accompanying her father, who was at the time living, and her mother Queen Nubkhesdeb, deceased. This princess has the title "Divine Wife of Amen, Adress of the god." She married Amen-hetep, a high priest of Amen, and became the ancestress of the priestly house which superseded the Ramessides, and claimed the throne in the next dynasty.

NEFERT-TERA is an unplaced queen whose name is mentioned in the tomb of an official, Pennut, at Anibe, dating from the reign of Ramses VI.³ The inscriptions refer to estates at Ibrim, which belonged to Queen Nefert-tera, who is named only as a queen, but with nothing to designate her position in the Ramesside family.

Another unplaced queen of this dynasty is THITI, "Royal Daughter, Royal Sister, Royal Wife, Mistress of Upper and Lower Egypt." These titles proclaim her one of the legitimate queens of Egypt, although her place in the list of sovereigns and queens-consort is unknown. Her tomb is in the Valley of the Queens' Tombs; it is well painted and decorated, and has an ante-chamber and a passage leading to a large chapel, from which open three smaller rooms.⁴ The identity of Queen Thiti has been confused with that of the famous Queen Thÿ, wife of Amen-hetep III., owing, doubtless, to the similarity of names.

¹ R.P., viii, 49, 50.

² L., D., iii, 229.

³ P., Ks., xix; L., D.T., iii, 101; Cairo M.

⁴ E., U.E., 187.

TABLE OF THE XXIST DYNASTY.

CHAPTER XIII.

QUEENS OF THE XXIST DYNASTY.

Thebes. About 1100 to 950 B.C.

ON the death of the last Ramesside prince, the sceptre fell from a feeble grasp to be taken up by the strong hands of Amen's priests. Through centuries, the power of this priesthood had been increasing, and when the High Priest Amen-hetep married the heiress of the Ramessides,¹ he gained for his house actual rights to a crown, the prerogatives of which had long been usurped by his fathers.

With the advent of the priestly dynasty, a new phase of woman's position appears, which still more accentuates her powers. When the priests became kings of Egypt, the office of chief attendant on the service of Amen was left vacant. The priestesses had been steadily increasing in importance for many years. As early as the XVIIth dynasty, Queen Aah-hetep held the title "Divine Wife of Amen,"² which was assumed in turn by all of her daughters, many of her grand-daughters, and the great queens who followed her. The priestess-queens were therefore the heiresses of the priests, when the latter left the service of Amen, to become the Pharaohs of Egypt.

Of this change, M. Maspero says: "The disappearance of the high priests had naturally increased the importance of the priestesses consecrated to the service of Amen. From henceforth they were the sole visible intermediaries between the god and his people, the privileged guardians of his body and double, and competent to perpetuate the

¹ P., H.E., III, 174.

² M.'s M.R., 617-635; L., D., iii, 38 a, b; 26 b; 19 c.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"line of the solar kings. The Theban appenage constituted "their dowry."¹

From this time on, the sacerdotal titles increase, and nearly every queen or princess adds one or more to her name, "Priestess of Amen"; "Royal Spouse of Amen"; "Prophetess of Mut", "Prophetess of Hathor"; "Chief of the Chantresses of Min, of Horus, and of Isis," etc.

By the time of the XXIVth dynasty, the supreme title of ^{*} $\overline{\Delta}$ $\overline{\text{P}}$ neter tuat, "Divine Worshipper of Amen,"² gives to its holder a practically independent crown, and the great Queens of Thebes appear; their children inherit the throne of the Thebaid, and are the brides sought by each new king, to legitimize his line.

As the high priestess is the sole representative of the divine rights, her power becomes so far-reaching, that, still later, she is able to transmit the legitimate royal claims by a simple "official marriage," or to bequeath them to an adopted daughter.

With the disappearance^a of the Ramessides, the priestly dynasty was inaugurated by the powerful high priest Herhor. His queen was

NEZEMT.

"Great Royal Wife, Royal Mother,
"Princess of the two Lands."

Herhor was a son of the high priest Amen-hetep, and probably of the princess Ast, mentioned above as the heiress of the Ramessides; he would thus have a legal claim through his mother's right to the crown which he assumed. The affiliation of Nezemt is not known, but as the founders of new dynasties usually strengthened their own claims and those of their children by marriage with princesses of the royal line, Nezemt, who has the heiress titles, was probably descended from the same stock as Herhor himself.

¹ M.'s M.R., 752; S.N.

² Trans. by BUDGE, H.E., vi, 63, as "Morning Star of Amen"

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It has been found a difficult matter to place this queen exactly. She was believed by Champollion, Lepsius and de Rouge to have been the wife of Herhor; later M. Naville¹ thought she was the mother rather than the wife of that king, and this theory was accepted by several writers. M. Wiedemann² continued to hold the original view of Nezemt's position, and M. Maspero in his "Momies Royales de Deir el-Bahari," adduces from the evidence, reasonable proof that this theory is the true one; it is also accepted by Petrie³ and Budge⁴ in their histories of the reign of Herhor.

The temple of Khonsu at Karnak contains the records of this family.⁵ The only queen appearing in the reign of the first priest-king is Nezemt; it is she who in the Karnak temple stands at the head of a long procession of sons and daughters, all of whom apparently belong to the house of Herhor. The eldest son, Piankh, is followed by eighteen other princes, and nineteen princesses. Queen Nezemt, heading the line, is called "Great Royal Wife, his beloved," and as in her funeral papyrus she appears as "Royal Mother," she is certainly to be regarded as the queen of Herhor, and mother of his children.

It is quite possible that the family of thirty-eight sons and daughters were all children of Herhor; and that on the Karnak tablet the queen and her own children are accompanied by those members of the royal family who were the offspring of the king by secondary wives not mentioned.

A further proof of the real position of Nezemt is found on a stela at Leyden.⁶ Herhor is there shown in adoration before Amen; he is accompanied by Nezemt, and they

¹ A.Z., 1879, 29 f.

² H.E., iii, 190.

³ L., D., iii, 247.

² W., G., 530.

⁴ H.E., vi, 13.

⁵ WIEDEMANN, Z., 1885, 82-4

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

worship together as equals before the god. The queen appears once more, in a family group, with her grandson Pinezem I., at Luxor.

On the death of Queen Nezemt, she was accorded a burial of great magnificence. The splendid double coffin of wood,¹ had a rich golden ground, elaborately ornamented with fine stones and coloured glass paste incrusting in the gold. In ancient times the coffin had been scraped for the gems and gold by thieves, who had taken care to respect the inscriptions and all representations of divinity. Only fragments of the original decoration remain. This coffin and the mummy of Queen Nezemt were found in the great cachette of Deir el-Bahari.

The mummy is described as 1 m. 65 cent. in length, the wrappings bearing the titles, "Lady of both Lands, Royal Mother." Fragments of toilet articles in painted wood inlaid with ivory, and a beautiful pendant, were found in the folds of the shroud. The mummy has been enclosed in the coffin, and is now in the Cairo Museum.²

The funeral papyrus of Queen Nezemt was torn into three parts, which are now in the British Museum,³ in the Louvre,⁴ and in the Murch collection.⁵ In the Berlin Museum, a glass bead is engraved with her name.⁶

THENT-AMEN. The period known as the priestly dynasty (XXIst) opened with a divided kingdom; two contemporary lines ruling, the one at Tanis and the other at Thebes. Both were probably descended from the Ramesside family, whose long occupancy of the throne must have left more than one claimant to the succession among their many descendants.

At the moment when the high priest Herhor assumed the crown of Ramses XII., and founded the hierarchy at

¹ M.'s M.R., 569.

² Gal. Q., Case A, No. 1195.

³ P.S.B.A., V, 79.

⁴ W., G., 531.

⁵ P., R., ii, 131.

⁶ 12766.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Thebes, a Tanite prince who had probably married a daughter of the last Ramses,¹ claimed his wife's right to a share of the kingdom, and established an independent government at Tanis. According to the story of a Theban official, Unuamen, the relations between the two ruling houses were of a friendly nature.

In the papyrus of Unuamen,² the name of the Tanite prince Nesi-ba-neb-dadu, is always coupled with that of his queen Thentamen, who appears as joint ruler with her husband over the Delta. The narrative of the official recounts the wish of the priest-king Herhor, to honour the great Amen of Thebes with a boat of cedar wood for the service of the temple. The trees necessary for its construction were only to be obtained in a distant land, and to Syria, therefore, Herhor sent his messenger to procure the wood.

It is evident that Herhor counted on the aid of the prince of Tanis in this enterprise, for he sent Unuamen to him to ask for boats. The papyrus describes the reception of the writer by Nesi-ba-neb-dadu and Thentamen, to whom he presented his credentials. He was kindly received and helped on his way by the Tanite rulers, whom he does not mention as sovereigns, but as "the Adorers (or guardians)"³ "whom Amen hath put in the North of his land."

Unuamen then proceeded on his journey, and in course of time had need of assistance from a foreign chief, who hesitated to give it until Herhor's messenger declared that he had only to send to Nesi-ba-neb-dadu and Thentamen at Tanis, and they would give him anything he wanted. This threat to apply to the Tanite rulers had, for some reason, the effect of forcing the chief, who gave to Unuamen 300 men and 300 oxen, to bring down the cedar trees.

¹ P., H.E., iii, 221.

² Coll., M., GOLÉNISCHEFF. ERMANN, A.Z., 1900, 1; Rec., xv, 88; xxi, 74.

³ BUDGE, H.E., vi, 4.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

These must have been procured in great numbers, since their transport to the coast occupied some months' time.

In the narrative, Queen Thentamen occupied the position of an heiress sovereign, through rights inherited perhaps from Ramses XII., the date of whose death precedes by only a few years the appearance of Thentamen as queen, at Tanis.¹

Before her reign as queen, Thentamen seems to have married in her youth a scribe called Nebseny, and to have had a daughter Hent-taui. The inscriptions of this princess call her a "king's daughter's daughter," and name her mother as Thentamen. The father of Hent-taui, having been only a scribe, her royal claim was entirely from her mother, who was a king's daughter, that king, again by a comparison of the XXIst dynasty dates,² apparently being Ramses XII. Unless, then, the last Ramses, or one of his brothers, had two great heiress daughters both named Thentamen, which is unlikely, the "royal daughter" of that name, who was Hent-taui's mother, was in all probability the same person as the Tanite queen Thentamen.

HENT-TAUI I.

"Royal Daughter; Royal Wife; Great
"Lady of both Lands; Royal Mother
"of the first Prophet of Amen; Mother
"of the chief Royal Spouse; Prophetess
"of Mut; Divine Mother of the infant
"Khonsu; Great One of the temple of "Khonsu in Thebes; Divine Worshipper
"of Amen."³

The princess who is described by these titles was the grand-daughter of a king, probably one of the Ramses, and, as noticed above, the daughter of an heiress of that line,

¹ P., H.E., iii, 204.

² Ibid., 140, 189, 193.

³ M.'s M.R., 576, 684, 686, 692.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Thentamen. Her father was Nebseny, a scribe, as defined by several inscriptions. Her titles prove that she was a royal consort, and mother of an heiress princess.

No monument precisely states whose wife she was. It is assumed by M. Maspero, in his elaborate study of this family, in the "Momies Royales de Deir el-Bahari," that Penezem I., third of the priest-kings, was Hent-taui's husband,¹ from the fact that she always appears with him. She occupies a position of great importance in the sculptures of this reign, although where she accompanies Pinezem's other queen, Makeri, it is that princess and not Hent-taui who wears the uræus crown, the emblem of sovereignty. From this fact, it seems that as Hent-taui's birth was not royal on her father's side, her own position was inferior to that of Queen Makeri.

Hent-taui may have been the first wife of Pinezem, married in his youth, which would account for her prominence on his monuments. A scene sculptured on the pylon of Khonsu at Karnak,² shows Pinezem adoring the god, while behind him Hent-taui sounds two sistra; she again appears with the king on a lintel at Medinet Habu,³ and one of the statues of Sekhet at Karnak has an inscription added by this queen.⁴ She was invested with high sacerdotal offices, having been priestess of Thebes, and chief high priestess of the cult of Mut, in whose temple she has recorded her name and titles.

Her son was the first prophet of Amen, probably Menkheper-ra,⁵ and the inscription which describes Hent-taui as "royal mother of the chief royal wife," seems to imply that she was also the mother of his queen. The mummy bandages of Hent-taui are inscribed with the

¹ This view was first taken by DE ROUGÉ, and afterwards adopted by LEPSIUS.

² L., D., iii, 250 c.

³ Rec., xix, 20.

⁴ L., D., iii, 249 f.

⁵ M.'s M.R., 692.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

name of Menkheper-ra, proving that she outlived her husband, and died during the pontificate of her son.

In the hiding-place at Deir el-Bahari, the mummy of Hent-taui was found in company with those of her husband Pinezem, her father Nebseny, and other members of her house. The queen's mummy was enclosed in two coffins, the larger one of which had once been gilded over a green ground; the gold had been scraped off, and, like the coffin of Queen Nezemt, only slight traces of the original decoration remained. The mummy, 1 m. 55 cent. in length, on being unwrapped, was found in a good state of preservation. In appearance, it is the most singular of all the royal mummies which rest to-day in the Cairo Museum.¹ At the time of the queen's death, no pains had been spared in the effort to preserve the face in as life-like an aspect as possible. To this end, all lines and depressions left in the skin by the process of mummification were filled in with paste, after which the whole visage was tinted with ochre to imitate living flesh; the cheeks were painted; the lips reddened; and the eye-lids half closed over inserted eyes of a brilliant enamel.² The head rested in a finely crimped wig of black hair, the long tresses of which closely encircled the face. Although the jewels had disappeared, the body still retained some traces of ornamentation, in small articles of stamped leather.

Ushabti or funeral figures, a box, and a copy of the Book of the Dead, were buried with her, and are now in the Cairo Museum.³ Of the great number of funeral statuettes found with the royal mummies, those of Hent-taui are said to be the best, both in execution and colour. Those belonging to the later princesses of this family are very inferior, showing the rapidly degenerating art of the time.

¹ Gal. Q., Case H, 1202.

² M.'s M.R., 576-7.

³ MARIETTE, P.B., iii, 12; M.'s M.R., 688; Cat. C.M., pp. 308, 435.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The portrait of this queen occurs in her funeral papyrus,¹ where she is figured standing before a table of offerings; the face in the papyrus, youthful and delicately drawn, bears no resemblance whatever to the repulsive mummy which was once Hent-taui, now in the Cairo Museum.

On the evidence of the Medinet Habu lintel, where Pinezem seems to be shown in homage before the queen, Petrie takes a different view of her position, and considers her to have been the mother rather than the wife of Pinezem, and the queen of Piankh, his father.² The only monument which bears out this theory is the lintel above mentioned; in all other instances she appears with Pinezem, and never with Piankh.

MAKERI MUT-SEM-HAT.

"Divine Wife, Royal Wife, Royal Daughter,
"Royal Mother, Great Lady of both Lands."

When the high priest "Pinezem I. assumed the government at Thebes as third king of the dynasty, a descendant of the old royal line, Pasebkhanau, reigned as king at Tanis. Although his power could not have extended beyond the Delta, he yet claimed as his birthright the title of master of both lands. Under these circumstances, it is not unlikely that he proved to be a formidable rival to the claims of the priest-king Pinezem. Moreover, his occupancy of the Northern throne seems to have been a legitimate one, and his descent from the Ramses as pure as Pinezem's own.

Policy pointed the way to a friendly alliance by marriage with the daughter of Pasebkhanu. This princess, Ma-ke-ri, accordingly left her father's court, and "came South," to bestow her hand on the king of the Upper country.

Among the great ruins of Karnak, that vast storehouse of Pharaonic records, Mariette discovered a curious inscrip-

¹ Cairo M., No. 687.

² P., H.E., iii, 202-5.

QUEEN MERIT.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

tion,¹ which, although much damaged, was capable of decipherment, and proved to be the marriage settlement of the princess Ma-ke-ri, which confers certain rights on her and her children. This monument leaves no doubt that Ma-ke-ri went South to her marriage, and that she was the daughter of Pesebkhanu, King of Tanis.

Unfortunately, the name of the king whose bride she became is not stated ; there seems, however, to be no reasonable doubt that her husband was Pinezem I. This appears to be established from the numerous sculptural scenes on the walls of Karnak, Medinet Habu, and Luxor, where she accompanies Pinezem as "Royal Wife." At Luxor, this king is followed by three queens, Nezemt, Hent-taui and Ma-ke-ri, presumably his grandmother, and his two wives.²

Ma-ke-ri was in her day the full regal heiress, descendant of a long line of monarchs, wearing the double serpent crown, and occupying the throne conjointly with the reigning prince. Her apparent claim of descent from the rulers of the South, as well as the Northern land of her birth, suggests that she was possibly a grand-daughter of that Herhor who founded the dynasty of Priest-kings. In this way she would have been of the same generation as Pinezem I., and his cousin.

From the absence of any evidence of active rule on the part of this queen, it appears that the actual exercise of her powers was transmitted, as usual, to the husband who shared her throne. Her grandchild, Pinezem II., claims his descent from King Pesebkhanu of Tanis, thus proving his own relationship to Ma-ke-ri; but through which one of the queen's children he was descended is not clear.

The children and grandchildren of Pinezem I. were the high priests Menkheper-ra and Masaherta, Pinezem II., a third Pinezem, who died young, and possibly the princess

¹ North face of Pylon VII.; M.'s M.R., 694.

² M.'s M.R., 690-92.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Astemkheb.¹ At least one of these was necessarily the child of Ma-ke-ri. The queen died in giving birth to a daughter, who did not survive her, and who was buried with her mother. The mummies were found with those of the queen's royal contemporaries, Pinezem I. and Queen Hent-taui. The mummy of Ma-ke-ri, 1 m. 50 cent. in length, was in good condition, but had been despoiled of its jewels and ornaments. It was wrapped in bandages of a fine rose-tinted cloth, the small mummy of the child, 42 cent. long, lying against the queen's shoulder. Of the two coffins, the inner was damaged, but the outer one was well preserved, it is a very fine one, skilfully executed, the body painted yellow, while the beautiful face which evidently portrays the queen's features is gilded. The case is inscribed with the name and titles of the royal heiress of Egypt.²

Besides the name Ma-ke-ri, there is a second name, Mut-em-hat, accompanied by the queenly titles. It is uncertain whether this belongs to the queen, or refers to the infant princess who died with her. In the former case, it is curious that in the many other records of the queen, she should not appear with the two cartouches, but is called by the single name only of Ma-ke-ri. It seems unlikely, too, that the child would have been buried with no name at all, and we have seen other cases where an infant bore the heiress titles, "Great Royal Wife," and "Lady of both Lands."³ In the absence of any positive proof to the contrary, many writers believe that it is the little daughter of Queen Ma-ke-ri who is designated as Mut-em-hat.⁴

The great funeral papyrus which was buried with the queen represents the spirit of Ma-ke-ri presiding at her funeral feast, her mummy standing behind her. She addresses the god of the dead in words of self-justification:

¹ M.'s M.R., 537-699, 701; P., H.E., iii, 190.

² Cairo M., Gal. Q, Case E, 1198; M.'s M.R., 577.

³ See page 68.

⁴ MASPERO, Momies Royales, etc.; WIEDEMANN; BRUGSCH.

QUEEN ASHESHEP

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

" I have come to thee O my Lord Osiris; the heart just,
" the hands pure. I have been just in my actions; I have " not sinned against the king; there is nothing in me of " which men can accuse me. I am without fault. Join " thyself to me, turn a benevolent face towards me, my " Lord Osiris, Great God dwelling in the West of " Abydos."¹

Besides the mummy and coffins, and the Book of the Dead, now in the Cairo Museum, 148 ushabti figures, together with their box, which had formed part of the queen's funeral furnishing, were found at Deir el-Bahari. The other records of Ma-ke-ri are sculptured on the Pylon of Khonsu at Karnak,² in a court of the temple at Luxor,³ and on the base of a statuette dedicated by Horhetep, the queen's steward.⁴ Her portrait is published in Champollion's "Monuments,"⁵ and the coffin inscriptions by Piehl.⁶

ASTEMKHEB I.

" Daughter of the Chief Prophet of
" Amen; Chief of the Chantresses of
" Min, of Horus and of Isis in Apou;
" Lady of both Lands, Chief Spouse of
" Amen."

To this queen descended the crown of her grandfather Pinezem I. She was the daughter of Masaherta, high priest at Thebes; and her grandmother was probably the queen Ma-ke-ri of the foregoing sketch. She seems to have enjoyed, for a time at least, some measure of independent rule. Upper Egypt was controlled by the fortress of el Hibbeh, which at this time was strongly ¹ M.'s M.R., 593; Cairo M., Room G, 687.

² L., D., iii, 248 g, 250 b.

³ Rec., xiv, 31, 32.

⁴ Marseilles M., 232; Rec., xiii, 148.

⁵ 280.

⁶ P., Ins., i, 64, 6; 75, 6.

⁷ M.'s M.R., 588, 703-4.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

fortified. Some part of the work was done during the sovereignty of Astemkheb, as bricks are found among the ruins,¹ stamped with her name and with that of her father, deceased, showing her position as his successor.

Somewhat later she married her uncle, the high priest Menkheper-ra, and henceforth their names appear together as joint occupants of the throne. Her life was a long one, as at first she exercised the regal authority alone for an unknown period, and with her husband Menkheper-ra, reigned for forty-eight years. This is proved by the inscriptions on a mummy whose bandages are dated under two kings, namely, Menkheper-ra, year 48, and Pinezem II., year 1. As Astemkheb did not, then, die until some time in the reign of her son, she must have been connected with the government of Egypt for more than half a century.

An echo of the civil wars which had distracted the kingdom shortly before this, remains in an address to Amen by his high priest Menkheper-ra, who petitions the god in behalf of a political scheme which the king has in mind. This refers to the recalling of some hundred thousand Egyptians, who had been banished to the Great Oasis of the desert, after a previous revolt and its suppression. Several times the demand was made of Amen, whose anger was supposed to be greatly incensed against the exiles, and as often as asked, the god gave assent. It may, therefore, be supposed that the large force was summoned home again, where they were probably needed to swell the armies of the king.²

Queen Astemkheb owned large estates, and an inscription dealing with the settlement of the property upon her descendants is engraved on the pylon of Horemheb at Karnak.³ The queen's family was very large; the members of it are mentioned in a long inscription, which is

¹ L., D., iii, 251 h.

² Stela at Thebes. B., R., xxii; B., H., ii, 194

³ M.'s M.R., 705; C., N., ii, 178; A.Z., xx, 75.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

unfortunately damaged. The most important of the sons were the high priest Nesibanebdadu, and Pinczem II. That this king was certainly the son of Astemkheb, is proved by the funeral papyrus of his wife, who always refers to him as "the son of Astemkheb."

The queen was given a splendid burial, as shown by the remains of the tomb furnishing which still accompanied her body when it was discovered at Deir el-Bahari. The mummy, not unrolled, measured 1 m. 62 cent. It had been despoiled, but the two coffins, of fine workmanship, remained in good condition; they are painted yellow, and the carefully worked head is evidently a portrait. The mummy, wrapped in light rose-coloured linen, lies in its coffin.¹

The Book of the Dead for the queen was enclosed in a hollow statuette of Osiris. Provision for her future comfort had been made on an extensive scale;² one large basket and two smaller ones of plaited palm fibre were filled with various articles of food, partly wrapped in bandages; gazelle, calves' heads, geese, bread of Durra flour, dried figs, grapes, dates, pomegranates, and fruit of the dôm palm, made up an elaborate menu which represented spiritual food for the nourishment of the queen's Ka. Other offerings were contained in earthenware vases. The carefully embalmed body of a small gazelle, enclosed in a box of the same form, was perhaps a pet animal of Queen Astemkheb, and had been placed as a companion in her tomb.³

A large wig made of hair and wool was contained in a white basket-work box carefully fastened by two clay seals, having the name of King Menkheper-ra.⁴ Several other curled wigs, some of enormous size, which formed part of Astemkheb's outfit, were also found. All of the ¹ Cairo M., Gal. Q., Case J, 1238; Lid, Case J; M.'s M.R., 577.

² Cairo M., Case B; M.'s Q.G., 424.

³ Cairo M., Gal. Q., Case Y, 1230; M.'s Q.G., 415.

⁴ Cairo M., Gal. Q., Case W, 1206.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

baskets were fastened with seals of the queen or her husband. Her name is engraved on four bronze libation vases and their stand, while the alabaster canopic jars have her sacerdotal titles. Several figurines or ushabti were likewise dedicated to Astemkheb.

The most important object found in connection with her burial is unique in the history of tomb furniture. This is the gorgeous canopy of blue decorated leather, under which the body of the queen rested during the funeral ceremonies. The top piece, about eight feet long and seven feet wide, is formed of three bands of leather, originally blue, which has faded to pearl grey. Across the central band six vultures spread their wings over a ground studded with stars. The side pieces are five feet long, and are bordered with designs in which figures of gazelles, scarabs, lotus flowers and plants are worked into a conventional ornamentation which is strikingly bold and effective.

The top piece has the name of the queen's father Masaherta, suggesting that it was part of his funeral canopy, to which new side pieces were added at the time of his daughter's death. These pieces have inscriptions in the name of Astemkheb and the cartouche of her son Pinezem II., in whose reign she died.

It is noticeable that the titles here given to the queen are those of her sacred offices: "Daughter of the first Prophet of Amen, Chief of the Chantresses of Min, of Horus, and of Isis in Apou." The finding of this interesting piece is described as follows: "As he was making his way into the tomb, Emile Brugsch Pasha picked up at the entrance to the long passage a parcel of leather clumsily wrapped together, which seemed to have been thrown aside by some Egyptian priest who was in a hurry to get away. The central part which forms the roof represents a starry sky, over which the vultures of Nechabit extend their wings to protect the

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

" dead. An ornamental border in stamped leather links " to this roof four side pieces, which were covered with a " draughtboard pattern of green and red squares, and hung " down on every side of the coffin, enclosing it as a tomb. " The inscriptions . . . invoke a happy rest for her " who sleeps under the funeral dais."¹

Unfortunately, the funeral tent is much damaged. The fragments of the original leather, with a restoration drawing by MM. Vassalli and Emile Brugsch Pasha, are shown in the Cairo Museum.²

HENT-TAUI (II.) was a daughter of Astemkheb and Menkheper-ra. It is doubtful if she is to be classed among the Egyptian queens, for although she would have been an heiress of royal rights through her mother, yet there is no conclusive evidence that either she or her husband and brother, Nesibanebdadu, actually occupied a throne. He was high priest of Amen, according to the inscriptions of a bronze statuette and of a pendant, and may therefore have held a place in the succession of Priest Kings of this dynasty. Numerous ushabtis of rough workmanship have been found, which have the name of the princess Hent-taui.³

A third princess of this line was ASTEMKHEB (II.), a daughter of Menkheper-ra or of Nesibanebdadu,⁴ and queen of Pinezem II. The decree of the original Astemkheb, which deals with the settlement of that queen's property on her descendants, names as her heiresses Hent-taui (II.) and Astemkheb (II.), presumably her daughter and grand-daughter. That this decree regarding personal property was of sufficient importance to be graven within the temple limits implies that not

¹ M.'s Q G, 493.

² Gal. Q, Case K, 1194. Fine illustrations of the canopy are published in MASPERO's Mummies Royales, etc., 585-87.

³ M.'s M.R., 707; P., H.E., iii, 214.

⁴ M.'s M.R., 711.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

only the Queen Astemkheb, but also the princesses to whom she bequeathed her estate, were the reigning high priestesses of the Theban cult of Amen.

There is no proof that Astemkheb II. was the wife of Pinezem II., but as she seems to have been the chief heiress princess at the time when Pinezem wore the crown, it is likely that she was one of his queens. Her coffins, alabaster canopic jars, and bronze vases, were found at Deir el-Bahari.¹

NESIKHONSU.

This princess² was the queen of Pinezem II., one of the last of the Priest Kings. Her father was Nesibadadu of the priestly line, her mother being a "Lady Tahonit-tauti," probably descended from the same stock. It is to her mother that Nesikhonsu continually refers in her funeral papyrus, as though it were solely through that parent that she claimed her supremacy and titles. The invariable form in which the papyrus names her is "this daughter of Tahonit-tauti."

In the monuments concerning Nesikhonsu, we probably have records of one of the great Queens of Thebes. A stela³ shows her before Osiris, and designates her by the unusual titles "Viceroy of Kush (or Ethiopia), Administrator of the Middle Country," titles which before this seem only to have been assumed by men. The domain over which the queen had authority is specified by the inscription on her mummy bandages, from which it is evident that she was the actual sovereign of a large part of the kingdom.

We have as yet no record of buildings or of independent acts of government by Queen Nesikhonsu, but it is not unlikely that she was engaged in works such as those

¹ M.'s M.R., 578-89.

² M.'s M.R., 606-9, 707.

³ Bought several years ago at Luxor and published by Miss EDWARDS, Rec., iv, 81, University Coll., London.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

which occupied other rulers of Egypt. She married her uncle, both her father and husband being sons of Queen Astemkheb I. and Menkheper-ra. The funeral papyrus¹ mentions her mother, brothers and sisters, and her four children, the princes Zaunefer and Masaherta, and the princesses Atai and Nesitanebashru.

The queen's death took place before that of her husband, and the same officials are named as having conducted the burials of both. That of Nesikhonsu was in the fifth year of some reign unspecified. A tomb inscription runs: "The year V, the 4th month of Shomou, " the 21st, when was entombed the chief of the favourites, " Nesikhonsu."² In the Deir el-Bahari tomb her mummy, two coffins, and a number of articles dedicated to her service were found.

The body of this Priestess Queen, who ruled Ethiopia more than a thousand years B.C., is to-day exposed in the Cairo Museum.³ When the mummy was examined it was found to be in good condition. A singular feature of its preparation was the use of onion parings carefully cut to follow the form of the features, and placed over the eyes and mouth. One of the bandages was inscribed with the name of Pinezem II., and a stamped leather ornament had the titles of the first Prophet of Amen, Pinezem, royal son of Pasebkhanu.⁴

The coffins showed a strange confusion of ownership. They had originally been made for Astemkheb II., and had afterwards, for some reason unknown, been altered for Nesikhonsu's burial. Such parts of the inscription as had the titles common to the two princesses, were left untouched, but the name of Astemkheb was covered with a coat of red paint, and that of Nesikhonsu traced over it. This coating has fallen off in places, and the name of the original owner

¹ Translated in M.'s M.R., 594-614.

² M.'s M.R., 521.

³ Gal. Q., Case Q., 1184.

⁴ M.'s M.R., 578.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

appears. Nor was this the only usurpation of the coffins; one of them was occupied when found by a mummy which was thought to be that of Ramses XII. It has as an outer wrapping a re-used bandage of the chief wife of Amen, Nesikhonsu, in the year VI.¹

A basket found with the coffins contained seventy vases of glass and earthenware, yellow, white and turquoise blue; all of which had the name of Nesikhonsu traced in black.² The funeral papyrus represents the queen before Amen, to whom she justifies herself, and by whom she is deified. Each paragraph begins, "Thus declares Amen-Ra, the 'very great god of creation.'" The deity says, "I have 'observed Nesikhonsu, this daughter of Tāhonit-tauti, and 'she has done no evil against Pinezem the son of 'Astemkheb."

The papyrus proceeds to enumerate the good gifts which Amen promises to the queen, assuring her immortal life. The same blessings are likewise granted to "the 'brothers and sisters of Nesikhonsu," and to "Ataui, 'Zaunefer, Masaherta and Nesitanibashru, the children of 'Nesikhonsu." The tabulated records of the queen are as follows:—

Coffin and mummy, Cairo M., Gallery Q, Case Q, 1184.

Shroud, Cairo M. Catalogue, p. 422.

A second coffin, with mummy Ramses XII., Cairo M.,
No. 1196.

A mummy bandage, on mummy Ramses XII., Cairo
M.

The Papyrus, Cairo M., No. 686.

A wooden tablet, Cairo M., Gallery Q, Case X, 1225.

A stela (Rogers), Louvre M.³

A stela (Edwards), University College, London.⁴

¹ Cairo M., 1196.

² Cairo M., Vestibule Jewel Room, Case B; M.'s M.R., 590.

³ Rec., II, 15.

⁴ Ibid., IV, 8.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Canopic jars, Parrish Collection.¹

Seventy vases of coloured glaze, Cairo M., Vestibule Jewel Room, Case B.

Ushabtis and box, Cairo M., Vestibule Jewel Room, Case A.

Near the mummy of Queen Nesikhonsu is that of her daughter NESITANEBASHERU, who died about 1,000 years B.C. The name of her husband is not known, nor any details concerning her, except that she succeeded to her mother's office of Priestess of Amen, and had a daughter named for her grandmother, Nesikhonsu.

The mummy and the two coffins of Nesitanebasheru² were found with those of her mother in the famous Deir el-Bahari tomb. The princess' wrapping were dated in the thirteenth year of the reign of Pasebkhanu II, her half-brother, and bear the stamp of Astemkheb, a high priestess.

Nesitanebasheru is one of the very few royal women of the ancient Egyptian Empire of whose personal appearance we have a definite idea. The mummy, 1 m. 75 cent. in length, is that of a woman between thirty-five and forty years of age at the time of death. It still retains a quantity of wavy chestnut-brown hair, eyebrows of a lighter shade, thick eyelashes, and wide lids closing over enamelled eyes of a dark brown, which probably represent their colour in life. The nose is slightly arched, the mouth full, the teeth good, indicating the age of the princess. The face was treated with paint and ochre in the same way as that of the Queen Hent-taui.³

It rests on a coffin originally gilded and painted, but afterwards covered with a coating of bitumen, which gives the case a black and rough appearance, and so damages the inscription that the title of Priestess of Amen, and the name of Nesitanebasheru, can only be made out with difficulty.

¹ Rec., IV, 80.

² Cairo M., Gal. Q., Case D, 1199.

³ M.'s M.R., 579-81.

7

CHAPTER XIV.

XXIIND AND XXIIIIRD DYNASTIES.

Bubastis. About 950 B.C.

THE beginning of a new dynasty at the close of the 150 years' rule of the Priest-Kings, finds the government in the hands of a man of foreign extraction, Sheshenq, whose chief claim to the crown probably rested on the strength of his sword.

It is possible that he had the advantage of royal descent through one of the many ramifications of the Pharaonic families.¹ At any rate, he seems to have followed the time-honoured Egyptian custom, and to have called an heiress of one of the native royal lines to share his throne.

KA-RA-MAAT was the princess whose rights were thus assumed by the XXIInd dynasty. She was a daughter of the Tanite king Pasebkhanu II.² A tomb discovered at Gurnah by Arabs, about the middle of the last century, but at present unknown, was probably hers. From this tomb came ushabtis and canopic jars, having the heiress titles, "Divine Wife, Lord of both Lands, Lord of Crowns," and royal cartouches enclosing the name of Ka-ra-maat, "Divine Adorer of Amen, loved of Mut."

Ka-ra-maat had inherited property in Upper Egypt which had been stolen from her at some time previous to her marriage with Sheshenq. When that king chose the princess for his wife, he hastened to right the wrong which had been done her, and issued a decree restoring her possessions. The ordinance was inscribed on one of the pylons at Karnak,¹ and purports to be a divine command.² "Thus spake Amen-Ra the king of the gods . . . With regard to any object of any kind, which Ka-ra-maat, the daughter of the king of Upper Egypt, Pasebkhanu, has brought with her of the hereditary possessions which had descended to her in the Southern district of the country, and with regard to each object of any kind whatever, which the people of the land have presented to her, which they have at any time taken from the (royal) lady, we hereby restore it to her. . . . Every king, every chief priest of Amen, every general, every captain and the people of every condition, whether male or female, who had great designs, and they who carried out their designs later, they shall restore the property of all kinds which Ka-ra-maat . . . brought with her as her inherited estate in the Southern district of the country, together with all possessions of all kinds which the habitants of the country have given her, and what they have at any time taken from the lady, it shall be restored into her hand; we restore it into the hand of her son, and of her grand-son, and to her daughter, and to her grand-daughter, . . . it shall be preserved until the latest times . . ."

¹ M.'s S.N., 769.

² A.B., xiii, B.M.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"Slain shall be all people of every condition of the whole land, whether male or female, who shall claim any object of any kind whatsoever, which Ka-ra-maat . . . brought with her as inherited estate of the South land, and any object of any kind whatsoever, which the inhabitants of the land have given her, which they have at any time taken from the lady as property . . . (they who shall keep back any object thereof), one morning after the other morning, to them shall our great spirits be heavy. We will not be any help to them, we will sink (their) noses into the earth."

¹ N. wall, 3rd pylon, S. of Great Temple, Karnak.

² BRUGSCH, Egypt under Pharaohs, 373-375.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

From the terms of the inscription, it seems that Ka-ra-maat had great riches, which were partly inherited from her father and partly gifts from the people; that for some reason she had probably left her Southern home, and had met with some misfortune which left her unprotected, and her possessions a prey to anyone who chose to take them. People of high and low condition were implicated in the robbery, for the command to restore her goods is laid on every "king, every high priest of Amen, every general, every captain," etc.

After the king's threats contained in the vigorous decree of Amen, the thieves probably returned to Sheshenq's queen the property of which as a friendless princess they had deprived her. The son of Ka-ra-maat was King Uasarkon I, and her grandson was a prince Sheshenq, who dedicated a statue to the memory of his grandmother, stating in the inscription her descent from the Tanite king.¹

She had probably also an elder son named Anput, who had the heir's titles of High Priest of Amen, and Commander-in-chief, but who died before his father.² Other records of this queen are contained on the stela of Horpasen, which refers to the wife of King Sheshenq I. as Ka-ra-maat;³ while a statue in the British Museum⁴ names a Maat-ra-ka, in connection with Uasarkon I., and as the daughter of Pasebkhanu of Tanis. It is evident that this princess is identical with Ka-ra-maat, the queen of Sheshenq, and that in the Hapi statue she accompanies Uasarkon as his mother.

Queen Ka-ra-maat is also to be found among the royal hosts of Karnak. The canopic jars from that tomb in Gurnah which was probably her burial place, are now in

¹ A. B., xiii, B.M.

² L., D., iii, 253 b, c; 255 a, b.

³ M., S., xxxi.

⁴ Statue of Hapi.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Berlin;¹ her ushabtis are scattered in many directions, and if they are called to answer the queen's summons, must do it from opposite ends of the earth.

When the Arabs broke into her tomb half a century ago, if the body of the queen still lay there, the intruders probably destroyed it; at present no trace of it is known, and the location of the tomb has been lost.

A sister² of queen Ka-ra-maat is said to have been that daughter of a Pharaoh whom King Solomon married, and took "into the city of David, until he had made an end of "building his own house, and the house of the Lord."³ Soon after, Pasebkhanu II. conquered the city of Gezer, and gave it "for a present unto his daughter, Solomon's wife."⁴

After Ka-ra-maat, there follows a group of several queens, the wives and mothers of the kings of the XXIInd dynasty; but of these royal women, no more is known than their names.

THENT-SA and TASHEDKHONSU were wives of King Uasarkon I., and both are mentioned as the mother of his successor, Takeleth I. On the ruins of the ancient quay at Karnak,⁵ Thent-sa appears, while the Horpasen stela⁶ is authority for the existence of Tashedkhonsu as a second queen of Uasarkon I. The assertion that she was the mother of his son Takeleth, is probably a mistake.⁷

HENT-TAUI, one of Takeleth's queens, is likewise no more than a name, appearing only as the mother of his son Uasarkon, another high priest of Amen.⁸

MUTEMHAT KAROMAMA, "Great Royal Wife; Princess; Great Lady; Mistress of the Country of the South."⁹

¹ L., D., 256 b, c.

² WIEDEMANN, A.G., 541; M.'s S.N., 738, 764, 772.

³ 1st Kings iii, 1.

⁴ 1st Kings ix, 16.

⁵ A.Z., xxxiv, 1111.

⁶ M., S, xxxi.

⁷ P., H.E., III, 243.

⁸ L.B., D., 1010.

⁹ B., H.E., vi, 88.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

These titles are accompanied by double cartouches naming the princess as the beloved of Amen and of Mut. She was one of the famous heiresses who were included among the Theban priestesses, and was the daughter of Nemart, a grandson of Sheshenq and his queen Ka-ra-maat.

Karomama married her cousin, Takeleth I., and was the mother of his son Uasarkon II. It was formerly thought that this queen lived at a somewhat later period, but her position seems now to be established from contemporary inscriptions on the quay at Karnak.¹

Her tomb has not been discovered, but several records perpetuate her name; she is found in the temple of Karnak, as well as on the quay;² a kneeling figure in the Berlin Museum mentions her;³ and her ushabtis are also known. The most beautiful existing memorial of Karomama is a fine gold-inlaid bronze statue in the Louvre, which is inscribed with her full regal titles, and was dedicated to her memory by one Aah-dufnekht.⁴

Takeleth I. was succeeded in office by his son Uasarkon II., the history of whose family is somewhat involved. The sovereign seems to have taken into his harem several wives.

KA-RA-MA was the chief one of these, and although her affiliation is unstated, her name suggests that she was a daughter of the same stock as Karomama. Her family consisted of four daughters, the most important of whom was her heiress Shepenapt (I.), and one son Sheshenq, who afterwards became the second king of that name.

Sculptures at Bubastis⁵ represent a great religious festival of Uasarkon and his queen Ka-ra-ma. In these scenes the king is several times depicted, always

¹ L., D., iii, 256 a, 257 a; P., H.E., iii, 246; A.Z., xxiv, 111.

² L., D., iii, 256 k.

³ P., R., i, 40; M.'s P.E., 117.

⁴ N., F.H.; N., B., 50.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

accompanied by the queen, in the performance of official ceremonies.

The temple of Osiris at Karnak has a memorial of Ka-ra-ma, and her tomb was at Thebes. For many years it was known to the Arabs, and must have been a rich treasure-house to them; as early as 1843, Lepsius bought ushabtis belonging to Ka-ra-ma, at Thebes. After more than 40 years the stock was not yet exhausted, for in 1887, more figurines of the series were sold in the same place.¹

A lapis-lazuli seal in the form of a scarab was given by prince Sheshenq to his mother Ka-ra-ma, the inscription suggesting that it was a New Year's gift.² The queen's eldest daughter Shepenapt, occupied the position of heiress-queen, probably even during her mother's lifetime. The other daughters, Tasha-kheper, Karamat, and . . . armer, are known only from the festival scenes at Bubastis.

MEHTIENUSEKT, a "Divine Wife of Amen," and a "Royal Mother," was a queen who, according to the evidence of the Horpasen stela, lived in the early days of the XXIIInd dynasty. She was first attributed to this date by Lepsius, on the evidence of some funeral figures. The stela further states that her husband was a chief Sheshenq, and that her son was prince Na-ro-math,³ who married the daughter of Uasarkon (II.). To this record must be added that of a stela at Abydos,⁴ which gives the same relationships, namely, Sheshenq married to Mehtienusekt, with Na-ro-math as their son.

The Abydos stela contains a long inscription relating to the "Osirian general of the Ma, Na-ro-math." The prince had died young, perhaps in his father's wars, and was buried at Abydos. Subsequently Sheshenq paid a visit to his son's grave, and was greatly incensed at the neglected state in which he found it. He addressed himself to Amen-Ra,

¹ PETRIE, H.E., III, 251.

² F.P. Coll.

³ Read also Nemart, Nimrod, etc.

⁴ M., A., ii, 36; R.P., xii, 95; B., H., ii, 199.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

saying of Na-ro-math · "Thou hast freed him from attaining to an infirm old age while he remained on earth. "Thou hast granted him his rest."

"Oh thou good Lord, put to death (the captain) of the army, the . . . secretary, the land surveyor, and all . . . whom (I) . . . sent to this estate, and who plundered (the property) of the altar of the Osirian general of the Ma, Na-ro-math, the son of Mehtienusekt, who is buried in Abydos, and all the people who have robbed his holy property, his people, his herds of cattle, his gardens, his offerings, and all that was dedicated for his honour."

Amen graciously assenting to this request, the priests and attendants left in charge of the tomb, who had neglected their duty, were probably condemned to death. Sheshenq then proceeded to restore the desecrated tomb, and to set up a "statue, in the form of a walking man, of . . . Na-ro-math," at Abydos.

The statue was brought up the river attended by "a large body of soldiers in many ships, no man knows their number. . . . It was set down in the splendid royal chamber of the holy of holies of the right eye of the sun, to carry the offerings on the altar table of Nufur. . . . The incense was burnt in the room of the star chamber for three days, . . . a memorial tablet was erected, . . . containing the command (of the great lord) in his name. And it was laid up in the holy of holies of the gods for ever and ever."

New attendants were appointed for the service of the tomb, and an endowment was made for its maintenance in truly regal fashion. "(This is the catalogue) of that which was appointed for the altar of the Osirian general Na-ro-math, the son of Mehtienusekt, who is buried at Abydos. There were allotted the people . . . Airomap-atut . . . Khu-amen . . . and Bck-ptah. (The price of) their purchase makes in silver money . . . thirty-five

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

" pounds . . . an estate (of 100 aruræ) in the region of " the heights to the South of Abydos, and in the region of " the heights to the North of Abydos." To this endowment of lands and slaves was added a " garden situated in the " district of the Northern heights of Abydos," and several servants, including six men, two boys, and four maids. The treasury of Osiris was charged with a large outlay of money for daily supplies of honey, of balsam, and of incense, " for the " altars of the Osirian general 'Na-ro-math," and provision was made for the " workers in the spice-kitchen, and for the " persons of the labours of the harvest."¹

A red granite statue in Florence is said by Brugsch to be the statue of Na-ro-math, which Sheshenq set up at Abydos.²

If Mehtienusekt's son married the daughter of Uasarkon II., this would place the queen, at a considerably later period, as his contemporary. Her funeral figures are similar to those of his queen Ka-ra-ma, and from these circumstances Petrie³ argues that Mehtienusekt was a wife of Uasarkon II., and that the tombs of the two queens must have been near together, and found at the same time by the Arabs who for forty years sold their ushabtis at Thebes.⁴

Mut-hez-ankhs is another wife of Uasarkon, who is mentioned by the historian of this family, Horpasen. She had a royal daughter named Thentspeh, who was a " Prophetess of Hathor," and " Divine Mother ; " but the position of Mut-hez-ankhs does not seem to have been important. An Ast-em-kheb also appears as a wife of Uasarkon, although having ecclesiastical titles, she can scarcely be supposed to have inherited royal blood, nor to have held a high place in the king's harem.⁵ She is

¹ BRUGSCH, E.P., 370-373.

² F.A.M., SCHIAPARELLI, Cat. 1521

³ P., H.E., 111.

⁴ They are now in Berlin and in the F.P. Coll. Bought in 1843 by LEPSIUS, and in 1887 by PETRIE.

⁵ M.'s M.R., 748-9

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

mentioned on the canopic jars¹ of her daughter Tasbastperu, who was also attached to the service of Amen.

SHEPENAPT I. was the great heiress of this family. She was the daughter of Uasarkon II., and of his queen Ka-ra-ma. When the old king Takeleth I. associated his son Uasarkon II. on the throne, the young princess Shepenapt seems to have been officially included in the regency,² and appears in the temple of Osiris at Karnak with the two kings.³

Her position must, for some reason, have been an extraordinary one, since she was honoured by her father and grandfather even during the lifetime of her mother Queen Ka-ra-ma, from whom she must have inherited her crown. That the queen Ka-ra-ma was still living at this time, seems certain from the sculptures at Bubastis, where she accompanies the king Uasarkon when he officiates as sole ruler, after the death of his father Takeleth; whereas it was before Takeleth died that the official rights of the young princess Shepenapt were apparently recognized.

A curious feature of her history is that, although the chief heiress, she is not mentioned as having married either one of her father's heirs. These were Sheshenq II. and Takeleth II.; but neither appears in connection with Shepenapt. Perhaps an early death accounts for her sudden disappearance.

The place in which one might have expected to find her is occupied by NESI-NEB-ASHERU, the queen of Sheshenq II., Shepenapt's brother and co-heir.

The wife of Sheshenq is named with their son Horsiast, on a figure of the god Bes.⁴

One other queen appears at the close of the XXIInd dynasty,

THENT-AMEN-APT, the wife of Sheshenq III. The base

¹ L., D., iii, 255 ε, h.

² P., H.E., iii, 245.

³ Rec., xxii, 131.

⁴ A., B. Cat., 33.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

of a diorite statue is inscribed by an official who was "keeper of the house of the queen, . . . doing the things of "the great chief queen of his Majesty, Thent-amen-apt."¹

XXIIIRD DYNASTY.

Bubastis. About 750 B.C.

Two or three kings of a new family form a short dynasty of only about thirty years' duration, which intervened between the close of the XXI^{Ind} and the Ethiopian conquest of all Egypt. The kings of the XXIIIrd dynasty were from Bubastis, and have left few records. Among them only one queen appears, TA-DU-BAST. From her name, she may be supposed a Bubastite princess, probably the wife of Pedubast, first king of the dynasty.

She was the royal mother of a king Uasarkon, a relationship named on a silver-gilt ægis of the goddess Bast, which was found at Bubastis.² As the mothers of the other two kings of this name are known, Ta-du-bast's son must have been Uasarkon III.

¹ F P. Coll ; P., HE., iii, 256.

² Louvre. P., C.E., 314.

TABLE OF ETHIOPIAN AND XXVTH DYNASTIES.

XXVTH DYNASTY.

CHAPTER XV.

QUEENS OF THE ETHIOPIAN DYNASTY.

From about 748 to 664 B.C.¹

EGYPT had now arrived at a period when the united kingdom of the North and South, was practically dissolved. The land was split up into many small principalities, each governed by a petty ruler.² "The divisions of the Delta were many. We find two kings, one at Bubastis, and the other perhaps at the Bitter Lakes; four Libyan Chiefs who wear feathers, at Mendes, Sebennyptos, Pasopd and Busiris; two of whom had split off Hermopolis and Xoïs for their sons; a royal heir at Athribis, and chiefs at Leontopolis, Letopolis and Sais; also two others without districts named. Besides all these, the latest branch of Westerners who came in held all the Libyan side under a chief. Thus there were 16 rulers in the Delta. In Upper Egypt, there was a king at Hermopolis, a heg prince at Herakleopolis, and a prince ruling from the Fayûm down to Cairo." ("Babylon.")

Under such conditions, the country would have fallen an easy prey to the first energetic prince who had chosen to attack it. The danger of a foreign conquest was averted by Pankhy, an Ethiopian chief.

The kingdom of Ethiopia is supposed to have been originally founded by one of the princes of the priestly dynasty, a descendant of Herhor.¹ Pankhy, coming from this stock, would have had a more legitimate claim to the crown of Egypt than most of the petty rulers who divided the sovereignty. He subdued the whole country without much difficulty, many of the towns welcoming him as their deliverer, while others submitted to the force of his arms.

¹ These dates reckon from the rise of the Ethiopians, whose first generation overlapped the XXIIIrd. The Ethiopian Dominion is usually known as the XXVth dynasty, the XXIVth having included a single king only.

² PETRIE, H.E., vol. iii, 269-70.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

To those chiefs who made no opposition, Pankhy accorded easy enough terms, while to those holding out against him he said, "If a moment passeth without opening 'to me, behold ye are reckoned as conquered, and this is 'painful to the king. Close not the gates of your life. . . . 'Behold ye, there are two ways before you, choose as ye 'will; open, and ye live; close, and ye die. His Majesty 'loveth that Memphis be safe and sound, and that even the 'children weep not."²

The Ethiopian Dominion of Egypt, founded by Pankhy I., lasted for over eighty years. A curious family arrangement appears at this time. Pankhy and his successors had each two great queens, who were apparently of equal rank and importance, one of whom lived at Napata, the capital of Ethiopia, while the other held her court at Thebes. Both were royal heiresses, and exercised a regal authority as representatives of the sovereign power in their respective cities.

The practice of sister-marriages still prevailed, and the succession continued to be strictly in the female line.

A stela, from about the year 625 B.C., gives a series of eight Ethiopian queens in direct descent, called "Mistresses of Kush."³ Each princess has the cartouche, and is called the "sister" of the king. These were the high priestess rulers of Napata, where one appears in connection with a sister queen of Thebes, she is called "Mistress of Nubia," while the Theban priestess bears the title, "Mistress of Egypt."

¹ BRUGSCH, E.P., 387; MASPERO, P.E., 169.

² Commemorative Stela of Pankhy, erected at Napata, now Gebel Barkal. In Cairo Mus. Published by BRUGSCH, Hist., ii, 231; Mon. Div., i-6; R.P., ii, 81; GRIFFITH, Egyptian Literature, 5275.

³ Mon. Div., 9; R.P., vi, 76; P., H.E., iii, 309.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

KENENSAT, the "Heiress, Great Favourite, Royal Wife," was the queen of Pankhy I., founder of the dynasty. She is named with him on a bronze figure of Bast, which is in the Louvre.¹

No other records of her are known, but, incidentally, an episode of Pankhy's conquest of Egypt throws a side-light on the character of his queen Kenensat. The chief who had been most stubborn in his opposition to Pankhy was Nimrod, King of Hermopolis. When forced at last to surrender, he was in great fear as to the treatment he might receive at the hands of his conqueror, and sent his wife to intercede for him.

This princess, Nes-thent-nes, was the "daughter of a king," and she went to the Queen of Pankhy to plead for her favour towards Nimrod. The story is told in the stela of Pankhy as follows: "Then Hermopolis surrendered and supplicated the king of Lower Egypt, and ambassadors came out of it and presented themselves with all things good to behold: gold, precious stones, garments of cotton, (before his Majesty) who had put on the serpent diadem, in order to inspire respect for his presence. But several days passed before they dared to supplicate his Uræus. Then (Nimrod) sent forth his wife, the queen and daughter of a king, Nes-thent-nes, to supplicate the queens and the royal concubines, and the king's daughters and sisters. And she threw herself prostrate in the women's house, before the queens, (saying) 'Pray come to me, ye queens, king's daughters, and king's sisters! appease Horus, the ruler of the palace, [Pankhy]. Exalted is his person, great his triumph. Cause his (anger to be appeased before) my (prayer); else he will give (over to death the king my husband, but) he is brought low!' When she had finished (her speech, her Majesty) was moved in her heart at the supplication of the queen."²

¹ P., R., i, 44.

² BRUGSCH'S Transl. E P, 395.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The following portion of the inscription is destroyed, but it appears that Pankhy's queen granted the prayer of Nes-thent-nes, and interceded for Nimrod, as later on Nimrod himself appears before Pankhy, and for a time gains his favour.

Nimrod's wife is spoken of as having appealed to "the queens"; but it is evident that it was the chief queen of Pankhy who is said to have been "moved in her heart" at Nes-thent-nes' supplication; therefore it was in all probability Kenensat who thus appears as a merciful sovereign and a sympathetic friend to the unfortunate princess.

But Nes-thent-nes' troubles were not over. After a partial reconciliation had taken place between the two kings, Pankhy went to Nimrod's palace, and "visited all the chambers of the king, his treasury and his store rooms. And he was content." But although Nimrod had stored up treasure, and made splendid his dwelling, he had abused the dumb creatures under his care, and in the whole field of Egyptian records there is no pleasanter touch of humanity than in the words of King Pankhy, when this fact came to his knowledge.¹ "When his Majesty visited the stables and the studs of foals, he observed that (they had) let them starve. He said: 'I swear, as surely as the youthful Sun-god Ra loves me, as surely as I breathe in life, it is a viler thing to my heart to let the horses starve, than all the other faults that thou has committed;'" and although the king had forgiven Nimrod's offence towards himself, yet for this neglect of the horses, Pankhy pronounced heavy judgment against him, and confiscated all his possessions.

A king Kashta appears about this time, probably as the son of Pankhy, and co-regent with him. He figures chiefly as the husband and father respectively of two important princesses.

¹ B., E.P., 396.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

SHEPENAPT II., his queen, was a Theban heiress whose father was Uasarkon III.¹ She was of the line of royal priestesses of Thebes, and to these rights she united those of the Bubastite and Tanite kings, from whom she traced her descent² The Ethiopian Kashta would greatly have strengthened his position by marriage with a princess of so exalted a rank as that held by Shepenapt.

She was the mother, or adopted mother, of that princess Amenertas who was afterwards famous as queen, and it is possible that one of Kashta's sons, Shabaco,³ was also the child of Shepenapt. This queen is represented in a grey granite statue which was found at Karnak, and is now in the Cairo Museum;⁴ possibly also a second statue in the same place, called "An Ethiopian Queen,"⁵ is connected with Shepenapt. A statuette in the Hermitage Museum at Petersburg, and a stela in Turin,⁶ record her name.

PEBATHMA was a second queen of Kashta. Her only known record occurs on a lintel at Abydos.⁷ The same monument mentions a princess Peksather as the daughter of King Kashta; from the connection of the two names, this princess was probably born of Pebathma.

MUT-KHA-NEFERU AMENERTAS.

"Royal Daughter; Royal Sister; Royal Wife;
"Chief Prophetess of Amen; Queen of Thebes."

This was the most important queen of the period, and the legal heiress of the kingdom. She bore the full insignia of authority, the uræus crown, and double cartouches. In her person were united the claims of two

¹ MASPERO, P.E., 211.

² Ibid., M.R., 753.

³ M.'s M.R., 741, 763.

⁴ Room X, 699.

⁵ Ibid., 687.

⁶ L., T., 1632.

⁷ Rec., xxii, 142.

AMENEMHAT

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

royal lines; that of her Ethiopian father Kashta, and that of her mother or adoptive mother, Shepenapt of Thebes

Amenertas was certainly the daughter of King Kashta,¹ with whom she is frequently figured in inscriptions; his wife Shepenapt is not definitely stated to have been her mother, but as inheritance through the female line continued to be the law, it was doubtless as that queen's daughter that Amenertas held the crown. She was the reigning sovereign of the principality of Thebes, a province which extended as far South as Aswan, and had its Northern boundaries at Thinis and Khemmis, the modern Abydos and Ekhmim. This important section of the kingdom was governed by the queen, with the assistance of a prime minister.

The priestess-sovereign seems to have been devoted to the service of Amen, and to the improvement of her beautiful city of Thebes, where she not only restored the works of her predecessors, but also dedicated to the gods, chapels in her own name. She left the records of her reign over a wide tract of country: Thebes, Aswan, Medinet Habu, Hamamet and Memphis, all bear evidence of her influence. There is, in fact, every reason to suppose that Queen Amenertas was a vigorous ruler, administering her kingdom in peace and prosperity, both as its political and its spiritual chief.

She shared the crown with two of her brothers in succession, Shabaka and Pankhy II.; but whenever represented in their company, she appears as a person of far more importance than the co-regents with whom she was associated. All the functions pertaining to her sacerdotal office, the high priestess was competent to perform unaided, but the military and other duties of a sovereign which a woman could not fulfil, were as usual relegated to the prince nearest in blood to the queen, or to a prime minister.

¹ For relationships of this family, see MASPERO, Momies Royales, etc.; ERMANN, A.Z., V, 29.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

To Shabaka, the elder of her brothers, the princess was married when between fifteen and twenty.¹ Their names for a time are connected, as was customary with a king and his consort;² these records are in the twelfth year of Shabaka, when from her titles, Amenertas appears to have been already the ruler at Thebes. After a few years Shabaka died, and the queen then married her younger brother Pankhy II., who appears but as a shadowy figure in comparison with his sister. One daughter was born to them, and was given the name of her grandmother, Shepenapt.³

Among the buildings at Thebes with which the name of Amenertas is connected is the Temple of Osiris at Karnak,⁴ and a chapel situated to the North of the Temple of Ptah.⁵ This temple was adorned with statues of the queen, one of which, a life-sized figure in alabaster, was found amid the ruins of the building. The statue is 1 m. 67 cent. in height, and was doubtless intended as a portrait of the queen. On the head is a heavy wig and flat crown, with triple uræi on the brow. At the time of its discovery, this monument was hailed as a great work of art. The features are, however, heavy, and the execution is not of the finest workmanship; nevertheless, the lines are graceful, and the beautiful material employed gives to the whole figure an air of delicate purity which makes it a pleasing portrait statue.⁶

The pedestal of grey granite has the following inscription: "This is an offering for the Theban Amen-Ra of "Apt, to the god Mentu-Ra, the Lord of Thebes. May "he grant everything that is good and pure, by which the

¹ M.'s M.R., 751.

² L., D., V, i, e; M., K., 45 e

³ Rec., xxiv, 212; G., H. Coll., 220.

⁴ Ibid., xxii, 126, 127; xxiv, 209, 210.

⁵ M., K., 45, c, d.

⁶ Cairo M., Room X, 685.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"divine (nature) lives, all that the heaven bestows and the earth brings forth, to the princess the most pleasant, the most gracious, the kindest and most amiable queen of Upper and Lower Egypt, the sister of the king, the ever-living daughter of the deceased king, the wife of the divine one—Amenertas—may she live."

"I was the wife of the divine one, a benefactress to her city (Thebes), a bounteous giver for her land. I gave food to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothes to the naked," etc.¹

From the same chapel comes a stela of sandstone, on which Amenertas, accompanied by her daughter and one or two other priestesses, is depicted in adoration before Amen, Mut, and Khonsu, the divine trinity of Thebes.² A black granite figure found with the alabaster statue is in a mutilated condition, but also represents Amenertas;³ a third statue in grey granite is in the British Museum;⁴ the name of the queen is inscribed on the rocks of Aswan⁵ and Hamamat,⁶ and other memorials of her reign exist at Medinet Habu,⁷ where she made numerous restorations and additions

Many small objects have been found which were once the property of Amenertas. These include bronze plaques from Memphis;⁸ alabaster and serpentine vases;⁹ a granite figure of Osiris;¹⁰ an altar for offerings;¹¹ a glazed cylinder;¹² a bronze door pivot;¹³ fragments of articles in stone and alabaster;¹⁴ and many scarabs and ushabtis in brown serpentine.¹⁵ Besides these personal mementos, there are many monu-

¹ B., E.P., 420.

² Cairo M., Room T, 644.

³ B.M., No. 36440.

⁴ L., D., V, i, e.

⁵ A.S., iii, 142

⁶ SABATIER, Coll.

⁷ B M., 29212.

⁸ Berl. M., 2107; A.M., 35.

⁹ Louvre and F.P. Coll. The remains of this queen, tabulated by PETRIE, H.E., iii, 288.

¹⁰ Ibid., Room X, W. wall.

¹¹ P., S., ix, 263.

¹² Rec, xxiii, 4; D., M.H., 29.

¹³ B.M., 24709, 4701.

¹⁴ Cairo M.

¹⁵ Ibid., 36301.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

ments of various officials who served during the reign of Queen Amenertas.

She seems to have had dominion over Thebes for many years, and possibly did not die until sometime during the reign of Pankhy's successor, Taharqa. This king built a temple at Karnak, and was assisted at the dedication ceremonies by a "divine wife," a princess-priestess. In the inscription recording this event, the name of the princess is effaced, but there are circumstances connected with it which make it possible that she is Amenertas.¹

PEKSATHER was a half-sister of Amenertas, the daughter of King Kashta, and a secondary queen, Pebathma.² This princess also became a wife of Pankhy II., but with the exception of her one mention at Abydos, she seems to have left no trace, unless she is the same as the queen figured on a stela at Bologna, who is called by M. Wiedemann, Pekersala, and by him supposed to belong to the XXVIth dynasty.³

The joint reign of the Theban queen and of Pankhy II. was succeeded by that of Taharqa, a son of Pankhy. This relationship is shown by a stela of Psamtek I.,⁴ where the wife of Taharqa is said to have been also his sister. As this sister was the daughter of Pankhy, it follows that Taharqa was his son, although the queen Amenertas was not Taharqa's mother. Pankhy had married a third wife, whose name, appearing in a somewhat mutilated form, is variously read as —rqa;⁵ Aqel;⁶ and AKALUKA.⁷ Her descent was from the priestly line,⁸ and she appears in the records⁹ of her son's coronation as,

¹ M.'s M.R., 762.

² Abydos Lintel, Rec., xxii, 142.

³ P.S.B.A., 1885-6.

⁴ A.Z., xxxv, 16; P., H.E., iii, 296.

⁵ L., D., V, 7 c.

⁶ BRUGSCH, E.P., 324.

⁷ MASPERO, P.E., 361.

⁸ E. DE ROUGÉ.

⁹ Tanis Stela. Discovered by MARIETTE; transl. by E. DE ROUGÉ.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"divine wife of Amen"; "royal sister"; "royal mother"; and "palm of love."

Taharqa, when a youth of twenty, had parted from his mother at Napata, and had gone Northward into Egypt. After some years had passed, he made good his pretensions to the throne, and desiring to be crowned, he sent to Napata for his mother, "sweet of love," to share his triumph. She accordingly journeyed to Egypt, where she was met by her son, who proclaimed her regent of the North and of the South, and "associated her with himself in the rejoicings" at his coronation. This ceremony, celebrated at Tanis, "with the usages customary in the Delta, was repeated at Karnak, in accordance with the Theban ritual; and a chapel, erected shortly afterwards on the Northern quay of the great sacred lake, has preserved to us the memory of it. Akaluka, installed with the rank and prerogatives of the 'Divine Spouse of Amen,' presented her son to the deity, who bestowed upon him through his priests, dominion over the whole world. She bent the bow, and let fly the arrows towards the four cardinal points, which she thereby symbolically delivered to him as wounded prisoners."

Nothing further is recorded of Akaluka, the "palm of love," but as Taharqa brought prosperity to the land, in his twenty years of government, and as his mother accompanies him in various temple scenes, it may be supposed that after their long years of separation, she lived a happy life by the side of her victorious son.

Taharqa had two great queens, both his sisters, one of whom was the "Great Heiress" of Napata; the other, heiress of Thebes.

AMENDUKHAT, "Royal Sister, Royal Wife, Great Heiress, Mistress of all Women,"² was doubtless by her position the hereditary ruler of Napata. She was probably that daughter of Pankhy,¹ who married first, Shabaka, and afterwards, Taharqa.

¹ M.'s P.E., 362.

² L., D., V, 5.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is known that Taharqa was succeeded by a step-son, the child of his wife by a former union with Shabaka. The name of this prince's mother is not given, but as the statement is clear² that he was the son of Taharqa's sister, it is probable that she was Taharqa's elder sister and first queen, Amendukhat. She would thus have been very young at the time of her first marriage, and after her union with Taharqa, several years the senior of her sister-queen, Shepenapt III.

Nothing is known of the life of Amendukhat, but the story of Taharqa's reign suggests that his queen must have passed through some trying scenes. The Egyptian king had great difficulty in holding his own against the Assyrians, who upon one occasion besieged Memphis and took it. At its fall, Taharqa escaped to Ethiopia, leaving behind him his queen, the crown prince Ushanahoru,³ and several younger sons.

The victorious invaders entered Memphis and took captive the queen and her family, as well as such royal children of Taharqa's predecessors as were resident at court. As Amendukhat was Taharqa's royal wife, and mistress of Egypt, she is doubtless the queen who, with her son Ushanahoru, fell into the hands of the Assyrians. Subsequently, Taharqa retook Memphis, although it does not appear what the fate of the queen and her children had been.

Eserhaddon, however, unlike other Assyrian kings, usually showed mercy to his captives; it is therefore probable that upon his re-entry into Memphis, Taharqa found his family unharmed.

Amendukhat's sister-queen Shepenapt III. links the waning Ethiopian dynasty with the rise of the Saitic power, and the sketch of Shepenapt is therefore included in the section on the XXVIth dynasty.

¹ M.'s P.E., 362, n 1, R.P., i, 64.

² Stela of Ashurbanipal (668 B.C.) ³ M.'s P.E., 373-81.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The last king of the Ethiopian dominion who has been certainly placed, was Taharqa's step-son, Tanutamen. This prince, as has been seen, was the son of Taharqa's wife. Before his assumption of the crown, Tanutamen had had a dream foretelling his sovereignty of Egypt. This dream he inscribed upon a stela which he set up at Napata,¹ and upon which he recorded his two queens.

QELHATAT, the elder of his sisters, was high priestess of Napata ; while GERARHENI was the priestess of Thebes. Both queens accompany the king on his Dream Stela, Gerarheni on his right, bearing the title " Mistress of Egypt," while on his left, Qelhatat appears as " Mistress of Nubia " As these queens were the sisters or half-sisters of Tanutamen, they must have been the daughters of Shabaka, or of Taharqa.

No details concerning the two princesses have come to light ; Gerarheni, although " Mistress of Egypt," can scarcely have been high priestess of Thebes, since her date coincides with that of Shepenapt III., who was the hereditary Theban Queen ; and it is not likely that this position could have been shared by two princesses at the same time. The history of the two queens of Tanutamen was, at all events, a short one, as that king's reign lasted only a few years

MERIT-TAFNOUIT, " Divine Wife, Royal Wife, Royal " Daughter, Royal Sister, Neter Tuat." This princess is an unplaced queen, who probably figured among the great priestess rulers of Thebes. A seal bought by M. Legrain at Luxor contained this hitherto unknown cartouche, written in violet hieroglyphs on a white enamelled ground.² No record of the princess has yet been found by which she can be definitely placed.

¹ From Mt. Barkal. Cairo M.; R.P., iv, 81; B., E.P., 405 ; M.D., 7, 8.

² LEGRAIN, A.S., V.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Before closing the history of the royal women of the Ethiopian dynasty, mention should be made of a certain princess called Mutardus, who, although she was not a queen, has left a charming image stamped on the records of this time by her father's devotion. King Menkheper-Ra, whose exact date is unknown, was probably one of the petty kings who ruled some sections of the country towards the close of the Ethiopian dominion.¹ This king had a daughter, described as a priestess of Mut and Hathor. Her father's poetical tribute to the charms of the princess is as follows:—

"A sweet of love, the prophetess of Hathor, Mutardus
"A sweet of love, unto the king Menkheper-Ra ;
"A sweet of love unto all men,
"A lovely one to all women, is this royal daughter ;
"A sweet of love, the beautiful of women ;
"A damsel of whom thou hast not seen the like
"Black is her hair, more than the blackness of night,
"More than the fruit of the sloe ;
"Red is her cheek more than the pebble of jasper,
"More than the crushing of henna."²

Anything like description of personal beauty is so rare among the records of the daughters of Egypt that this picture of Mutardus is especially attractive, although the slight stiff figure of the princess which is graven on the king's stela does not at all suggest the beauty attributed to her in the text.

The dominion of the Ethiopian princes in Egypt came to an end about 664 B.C., with the conquest of the sovereign power by Psamtek, founder of the XXVIth dynasty, which had its rise at Sais in the Delta.

¹ P., H.E., iii, 292.

² Stela in Louvre, No. 100. Pr., M., 4 ; A.Z., xvii, 53.

CHAPTER XVI.

XXVITH DYNASTY.

Sais. About 664 to 525 B.C.

THE sovereign rights of the Ethiopians were carried over to the new Saitic dynasty by the princess who bears the cartouches,

MUT-AR-RA-HENT-NEFERU

SHEPENAPT (III.).

Great Queen of Thebes; Divine Worshipper, and Royal Daughter of the Ethiopian king, Pankhy II.¹

Her mother, as before noticed, was Amenertas,² from whom she inherited the Theban principality. The stela of Psamtek I.³ proves that she was the half-sister of King Taharqa. She was a child of only seven when he ascended the throne, and she may even have been among the royal children who with Taharqa's queen were made prisoners by Eserhaddon when he captured Memphis.

It was not until she was about twenty years of age⁴ that, following the custom of her time, the heiress was married to

¹ G., H. Coll., 220.

² Ibid.

³ A.Z., xxxv, 16, 28.

⁴ P., H.E., iii, ~~table~~, p. 279.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

her brother Taharqa, some twenty-two years her senior. The joint reign of Taharqa as king of Egypt, and Shepenapt as hereditary ruler of Thebes, lasted about thirteen years. One child at least, a daughter called Amenertas, was born of this union. The sovereigns signalized their reign by the building of a chapel at Karnak, dedicated to Osiris.¹ It lies about 200 feet to the north of the great Hypostyle Hall, and consists of two small chambers, the walls of which are sculptured with the inscriptions of Taharqa and his queen.

This period of Shepenapt's life was filled with dangers and alarms; menace from a brutal foreign foe; perils to crown, life, and liberty; hurried flights from the palace, when escape meant life or death. A second Assyrian invasion of Egypt, about 668 B.C., put the country at the mercy of a relentless enemy, and Taharqa again fled into Ethiopia, where he died.

Meanwhile Shepenapt must have escaped to a place of safety; for the Assyrian forces of Ashur-bani-pal sacked Thebes, burnt its temples, carried away the treasures of Amen,² and if the high priestess had been found within its walls, her fate would doubtless have been a tragic one. Instead of which, a few years later, the rise of the Saitic dominion finds Shepenapt still firmly seated on her priestess throne, reigning with Psamtek in harmony and peace.

The queen's safety may have been due to the vigilance of the governor of Thebes, who was "the fourth prophet of Amen," Mentuemhat. He was the chief official of this reign, and the active administrator of such affairs of the state as could not be transacted by the priestess-ruler.

On the death of Taharqa, the power of Shepenapt may have suffered a temporary eclipse during the short reign of his successor, who had two "Great Queens" of his own; the

¹ A.S., iv, 181; Rec., xxiv, 209-12.

² M.'s P.E., 385.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

"Mistress of Nubia," and the "Mistress of Egypt." This was during the last troubled years of the Ethiopian dominion, and with the dawn of a new dynasty, Shepenapt's star shone out with undiminished splendour. The conqueror of the Ethiopian's throne, not only placed no restrictions on the Theban Queen's position, but he seems to have left the government of Thebes entirely to its hereditary sovereign.

It was at some period during this practically independent reign of Shepenapt that a fleet of nine ships from Ethiopia came down the river and landed at the temple quay of Karnak; they were laden with many things which were probably intended for the service of the temples, the records being placed in the temple of Mut.¹ The cargo included 1,500 turtle doves, 900 bundles of reeds, 12,000 bundles of nef plants, and over 100,000 dóm palm nuts. The seventh ship was named the "Harem of Amen," which suggests that priestesses from the Southern country had been sent down for the service of the god; these would naturally be received by their chief, Shepenapt, to whom, indeed, the whole fleet may have been consigned.

So prominent a position does the queen hold during this reign, that many writers have considered her the wife of Psamtek. She is not spoken of in that connection, however, and it seems probable that if he made her his queen, it was only by an official marriage², such as he might have considered necessary to strengthen his hold of the crown.

About this time, perhaps under Psamtek himself, the system of family relations underwent a peculiar change, which rendered domestic affairs more complicated than ever. Two Great Queens ruled, as in the Ethiopian dynasty; the one at Napata being the actual wife of the king, while the other appeared dwelling alone at Thebes, as "Divine Spouse of Amen." The high priestess queen had no daughter³ to inherit her office and crown, but was forced by the king to adopt a daughter, the child of his Southern queen. This princess inherited the full rights of her adopted mother, became the Queen of Thebes, and adopted in turn a daughter of the reigning king. In the case of Psamtek, at least, one may hazard a conjecture as to the reason for this complication of the laws of inheritance.

¹ B. and G., M., 370-9, xx-xxii.

² M.'s P.E., 492.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT

Shepenapt, with the full rights of the Theban state, was perhaps no longer young at the accession of Psamtek. He, with a royal wife and daughters of his own, would naturally wish to possess the crown of Thebes, and no more efficacious way would present itself than to associate his daughter with Shepenapt, and have her recognized as that queen's legal heiress. It cannot have been difficult to legalize any extreme position in a country where it was so often the custom to ignore facts in favour of imagination. The whole system of the divine rights of the Theban heiresses, or Spouses of Amen, rested on the fiction of the "solar blood," transmitted metaphorically through the priestesses of "Amen's harem";¹ or, in cases such as those of Hatshepsut and Amen-hetep III., by a divine miracle.

Shepenapt seems to have had at least one daughter of her own, born during her joint reign with Taharqa.² This princess, Amenertas, would have been the real heiress of Thebes, but either she died early or else her rights were set aside by Psamtek in favour of his daughter Nitaqert, whom he sent down the river to Shepenapt to be her successor. Few facts are found in Egyptian history which illumine any part of the human lives led by the royal women who wore the heiress' crown. Certainly there is nothing in the case of Shepenapt to show her real feeling at the forced adoption of Nitaqert. If she sorrowed in secret that her daughter had been set aside, and chafed at her own helplessness to uphold that daughter's rights against the conqueror, no hint of it appears.

¹ M.'s P.E., 164, 172.

² A.Z., xxxv, 17, 28.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The document of Psamtek,¹ which records the adoption of his daughter, contains only the official expression of Queen Shepenapt's views regarding that event, and the joy which she is said to have felt on beholding her young coadjutor for the first time, is apparently voiced by Psamtek and not by the queen herself.

According to the present system of calculating the approximate ages of Egyptian rulers,² Shepenapt was born about 700 B.C., and did not die until after 655, at which time the adoption of Nitaqert took place. During more than half her life, Shepenapt controlled Thebes, as she was only twenty when she married Taharqa and was named as high priestess. The monuments of her reign which are found at Thebes, are the chapels of Osiris, as Lord of Eternity³ and as Lord of Life.⁴ Other records survive in the "Stela of Adoption" sphinxes in the Cairo and Berlin Museums,⁵ a lintel from Karnak,⁶ and fragments of a statue. At Medinet Habu her name is inscribed in a funeral chapel⁷ and on an altar of black granite.⁸ In the Wady Gasus is a rock inscription in which Shepenapt appears with her adopted daughter and Psamtek. Of small objects naming the queen, a bronze plaque comes from Memphis,⁹ a bronze box inlaid with gold and silver is in the Louvre, as well as a plaque and a scarab,¹⁰ while an alabaster box and a sandstone cartouche are in the F. Petrie collection.¹¹

MEHTIENUSEKHT, "The great Royal Wife, chief one of his Majesty,"¹² Psamtek I., was probably already his queen at the time of his accession.

She was the actual mother of Nitaqert, of whom Shepenapt was the adoptive mother. Brugsch thinks that

¹ Karnak Stela Cairo M., Room T, 673 ; A.Z., xxxiv, 16, 24

² A.S., V, 88 ; P., H.E., iii, 279, 339.

³ A.S., iv, 181.

⁴ Rec., xxiv, 209-12.

⁵ Berl. M., 7972

⁶ Cairo M. ; M.'s Q.G., 168, 177.

⁷ Rec., xvii, 118 ; xx, 74.

⁸ Ibid., xx, 75.

⁹ A.S., iii, 142.

¹⁰ S., h, 456.

¹¹ P., H.E., iii, 327.

¹² Rec., xx, 83.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

the king's successor, Necho II., was her son.¹ She was a Heliopolitan princess, the daughter of the high priest Horsiast. A union with the heiress of Heliopolis would considerably have strengthened the rising power of the Saitic house. Memorials of Mehtienusekht appear at Medinet Habu, in the same funeral chapel which records Shepenapt.² She is there named, in company with Amenertas and Shepenapt, on some re-used blocks of stone, originally belonging to the XVIIIth dynasty.

Her connection in the above inscription with the two famous Theban queens, makes it possible that she too was one of the "Divine Worshippers of Amen."³

NITAQERT MUTNEB-NEFERU.

"Divine Worshipper and Great Queen of Thebes."

This princess, as noticed above, was the daughter of King Psamtik, "born of the Great Royal Wife Mehtien-usekht," and, by adoption, Shepenapt's heiress. Nitaqer had no birthright to the priestess throne of Thebes. She was rather the heiress through her mother of rights over Heliopolis, and the Theban sovereignty was practically a gift from her father.

Queen Shepenapt, ruling at Thebes when Psamtek assumed the crown of Egypt, consented to receive the king's daughter, and accordingly in the ninth year of his reign, Nitagert, then about fifteen years old,⁴ was taken

¹ B., EP., 325.

² D., M.H., 40; Rec., xix, 21; xx, 83; L., D.T., iii, 157.

³ M.'s M.R., 751.

* P., H.E., iii, 337.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

from her own mother and her home at Memphis and sent up the river to Thebes to be the companion and adopted daughter of the Theban Queen. The account of the princess' installation by the side of Shepenapt was engraved on a red granite stela and placed in one of the temples at Karnak. This monument was found by Legrain, who published it.¹ A résumé of the story is given in the "Passing of the Empires."²

"A deputation of the nobles and priests of Thebes came to escort the princess from Memphis in the month of Tybi in the 9th year of the reign. Psammetichus formally presented her to them, and the ambassadors, having listened to his address, expatiated in the customary eulogies on his splendour and generosity. 'They shall endure as long as the world lasteth; all that thou ordaineth shall endure. How beautiful is that which God hath done for thee! . . . Our Lord Psammetichus has made a gift to his father Amen; he has given him his eldest daughter, his beloved Nitaqert Shapenuapit, to be his divine spouse, that she may shake the sistrum before him.' On the 28th of Tybi, the princess left the harem, clothed in fine linen and adorned with ornaments of malachite, and descended to the quay, accompanied by an immense throng, to set out for her new home. Relays stationed along the river at intervals made the voyage so expeditious, that at the end of sixteen days the princess came in sight of Thebes."

"She disembarked on the 14th of Khoiak, amid the acclamations of the people; 'She comes, the daughter of the King of the South, Nitaqert, to the dwelling of Amen, that he may possess her and unite her to himself; she comes, the daughter of the King of the North, Shapenuapit, to the temple of Karnak, that the gods may there chant her praises.' As soon as the aged Shapenuapit had seen her coadjutor, 'she loved her more than all things,

¹ A.Z., xxxv, 16-19.

² MASPERO.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

" and assigned her a dowry, the same as that which she had " received from her own parents. The magnates of Thebes
" . . . and the prophets of Amen, vied with each " other in their gifts of welcome; Psammetichus, on his " side, had acted most generously, and the temples of " Egypt assigned to the princess an annual income out of " their revenues, or bestowed upon her grants of houses and
" lands, in all constituting a considerable inheritance."

It was, therefore, as an heiress of great fortune that Nitaqert was received by Shepenapt, and installed as the future ruler of Thebes. Other records of the position of Nitaqert in the line of the Theban priestess-queens are found on a rock tablet of the Wady Gasus, where Psamtek makes offering to the gods and is accompanied by Shepenapt and his daughter Nitaqert; and on a stela from Karnak, which depicts three queens in succession, Amertert, Shepenapt and Nitaqert.¹

It is not improbable that Queen Shepenapt still lived for a few years after Nitaqert's adoption, training with care the young princess who was destined to succeed her. When she died, after 654 B.C., Nitaqert assumed the pontifical authority of Thebes. She was very young when the crown of the Theban queens descended to her from her adopted mother, and for some forty-five years she ruled the Thebaid in connection with her father, who reigned as King of Egypt.

Seventeen years after the installation of Nitaqert, an official, Ibe, was appointed by the king to rebuild her palace at Thebes. Ibe's inscription regarding this commission² begins with a recital of the ceremonies connected with Nitaqert's adoption, and then proceeds with an account of her palace. It was built of stone, " 100 cubits high and 100 cubits wide;" its ceilings were gilded and inlaid with precious stones, and it was elaborately furnished.

¹ Cairo M., Room T, 644.

² On a statue bought by LEGRAIN at Luxor.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

It is possible that this was the old palace of Shepenapt, which, forming part of Nitaqert's inheritance, was remodelled and decorated for her use by the order of the king.

In 610, when Psamtek died, his son Necho, who was Nitaqert's brother, succeeded him. The queen was not married to Necho,¹ and was at that time over sixty. She appears to have held the authority at Thebes all through her brother's reign, under the same conditions as those accorded to Shepenapt by Psamtek; that is, she represented the sole government of the province, aided in its administration by a prime minister. The queen was apparently dedicated solely as high priestess to the service of Amen, in a spiritual sense, remaining unmarried and childless, and transmitting her rights only to an heiress by adoption.

The princess chosen by Nitaqert to succeed her, was her grand-niece, the daughter of Psamtek II.² The record of Queen Nitaqert's long reign shows that she administered her office for many years, under four different kings: her father, brother, nephew, and grand-nephew, Haa-ab-ra, in the fourth year of whose reign she died, at the age of more than eighty years. The stela³ of her adopted daughter records the death of the queen in the "4th month of the 3rd season, day 4, year 4th," of Haa-ab-ra; when the Divine Worshipper Nitaqert "went forth triumphant to heaven."

She was then laid in a granite sarcophagus, and interred in the land she had governed so long. More than 2,400 years later, the sarcophagus, despoiled of its royal occupant, found its way to the great Museum of Antiquities in Cairo, where it is now preserved.⁴ It is an imposing one of rose granite, the lid having a representation of the recumbent figure of the queen.

¹ P., H.E., iii, 337.

² ERMANN, Z., xxxv, 24, 29; M.'s M.R., 758; DARESSY, Rec., xx, 84. ³ A.S., V, 86.

⁴ Cairo M., Vestibule of the S.W. staircase, centre, 37.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

The monuments of the long reign were all found at Thebes ; they include besides the stelæ and the sarcophagus already mentioned, a memorial in the funeral chapel at Medinet Habu,¹ some glazed pottery,² a socket dedicated to Horus by Horsias,³ and a black basalt statue of Osiris which bears the queen's name.⁴ The figure is 1 m. 5 cent. in height and is a good representative work of the Saitic period ; the product of an art rich in portraiture, in accurate carving of hard material, and in an extraordinary wealth of beautiful small objects.

TAKHUAT was the "Great Royal Wife, chief one of his Majesty," Psamtek II.⁵ She was the mother of that princess whom the high priestess Nitaqert adopted. The position of Queen Takhuat is established by the inscription on the coffin of her daughter : the "Royal Daughter of the "Lord of both plains, Psamtek. Her mother [adoptive] "was the Divine Adress Nitaqert. Born of the Great "Royal Wife, chief one of his Majesty Takhuat"⁶ No other record of Psamtek's queen is known.

The last queens who appear in the closing period of the history of ancient Egypt are three royal heiresses connected with the king, Aahmes II., who succeeded Haa-ab-ra on the throne, about 570 B.C.

THENT-KHETA, the first of these, was Aahmes' queen and the mother of his eldest son Psamtek III. The king Aahmes does not seem to have been of royal birth, he would therefore have legalized his occupancy of the throne by connections with the royal heiresses of the Saitic line. As Thent-kheta was "Great Royal Wife ; Royal Daughter," and the mother of his heir, she was evidently the more

¹ Rec., xx, 83.

² Louvre. P., L.S., h, 456.

³ HOFFMAN, Coll., 366.

⁴ Cairo M., Room X, 686.

⁵ MASPERO and ERMANN. Other views of the position of this queen have been taken by LEPSIUS ; E. DE ROUGÉ ; HINCKS ; and WIEDEMANN.

⁶ B., S.A., 383, 486.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

important one of his two wives, and must have been either a member of the royal house of Sais ; or, as Brugsch thought, a descendant of the Ethiopian line through Queen Amenertas.¹

The father of Thent-kheta was Petenit, a prophet in the service of the god Ptah. The record of the queen is on a stela set up by her son Psamtek, in the Serapeum at Memphis.²

NEKHT-SEBASTRU was the second queen of Aahmes II. Her descent is unknown, but she was the mother of two of the king's sons, one of whom, Pasenkhonsu, has left a stela in the Serapeum which calls Nekht-sebastu his mother, and the queen of Aahmes.³ Her second son had his father's name Aahmes, and was "chief of the archers."

The queen and this son were interred in the great cemetery which surrounded the pyramids; the two sarcophagi were found near the pyramid of Khufu, and are now in Petersburg.⁴

The story is told under this reign of a royal daughter of Egypt, deprived of her rights by Aahmes, who had supplanted her father, Haa-ab-ra, on the throne. It is said that the wrongs of this princess were the indirect cause of the conquest of Egypt by the Persians. Herodotus relates the tale, and says of the princess :⁵ "There was a daughter "of Apries [Haa-ab-ra], the former king, very tall and "beautiful, the only survivor of the family; her name was "Nitetis."

The Persian king, Cambyses, had sent to Egypt a request for a daughter of Aahmes in marriage. As the Persians were considered barbarians by the Egyptians, Aahmes hesitated to give his own daughter in answer to

¹ B., E.P., 325.

² E. DE ROUGÉ, N.H., 56, 57 ; Rec., xxi, 63.

³ Rec., xxii, 171 ; B., T., 637.

⁴ G., H. Coll., 94, 96.

⁵ HERODOTUS, iii, 1.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

the demand, but fearing the wrath of the powerful Cambyses, he did not dare ignore it. Casting about in his mind for a way to save his daughter from a Persian harem, he bethought him of the solitary princess Nitetis, whom his own usurpation of the crown had left fatherless and helpless.

This princess, Amasis [Aahmes] then took, and "having adorned her with cloth of gold, sent her to Persia," as his own daughter. Nitetis, having arrived before Cambyses, took vengeance on her betrayer, by telling the Persian king of the deception Aahmes had tried to practice, saying: "I perceive, O king, that you have no suspicion of the way in which you have been deceived by Amasis; he took me, and having dressed me as his own daughter, sent me to you. In reality I am the daughter of Apries, who was his lord and master until the day that he revolted, and, in concert with the rest of the Egyptians, put his sovereign to death."

The desire of Nitetis to avenge her own and her father's wrongs, was gratified; for Cambyses, enraged, sent his forces against Egypt, and began the campaign which resulted in the Persian conquest of the double kingdom. A different version of this tale, according to Herodotus, was told by the Egyptians, who asserted that Nitetis married Cyrus, and was the mother of Cambyses, who had thus a right to the Pharaoh's throne which he conquered.¹ Herodotus himself did not believe this version, and in relating it, pointed out various reasons why it was probably untrue.

The glorious history of independent Egypt was now nearing its end. The Empire was shattered; its pride was humbled; its victorious armies and mighty Pharaohs were no more; foreign foes encroached with ever-growing boldness upon the land; and the kingdom had entered on that troubled period which was destined to be one of the closing scenes of its life, when the throne of Thebes was ascended by the last great native queen who appears in Egyptian history,

¹ Rec., xxi, 57; L., D., iii, 283 m; B., T., 636; P., Ins., i, 32-3 R.P., x, 49.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

ANKHNES-NEFER-AB-RA.

From first to last, the long line of the royal heiresses of Egypt extends over a period of nearly 4,000 years; it begins, more than 6,000 years ago, with Neith-hetep, and practically ends with the last Queen of Thebes, about 525 B.C.

Ankhnes-nefer-ab-ra was the daughter of the "Lord of the plains [Psamtek I.] born of the Great Royal Wife, chief one of his Majesty Takhuat," and the adopted heiress of her great-aunt Nitaqert. She had probably entered the priestess service of Amen when very young, and was about thirty-four¹ when the death of the aged Nitaqert made her queen of Thebes, with the double cartouches Mut-mery-heq-neferty Ankhnes-nefer-ab-ra.²

Her accession to the throne of the Thebaid occurred on the 16th of Mesore [July] in the 4th year of the reign of her elder brother, Haa-ab-ra³ (in 586). A second brother was called Psamtek,⁴ and the same monument names her three sisters, Neitmartefs, Astkhebt, and . . . sentnery.⁵ The queen did not become the wife of her brother Haa-ab-ra, although she was in authority at Thebes through some fifteen years of his reign.

Upon his murder, and the accession of Aahmes II. as king of Egypt, the high priestess was probably forced to submit to the usual custom, and legitimize the usurper's position by sharing with him her crown. This seems not to have been done by marriage, but by an official connection,

¹ P., H.E., iii, 339; A.S., V, 88.

² A.S., V, 86, 90.

³ Ibid., 87.

⁴ A Naos in the Cairo M.; Rec., xvi, 46.

⁵ Ibid., P.; H.E., iii, 341.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

which was authority enough at a time when the claims of natural rights could always be superseded at will. It is certain that the queen is nowhere called the wife of either king under whom she reigned, and that no records have been found of any other husband, or of children, in connection with her. She appears, at least officially, a solitary figure, as the last "Divine Worshipper" at the shrine of Amen.

The most important memorial of her reign is the alabaster stela found by Legrain at Karnak in 1904.¹ It recounts the adoption by Nitaqert of Ankhnes-nefer-ab-ra; establishes her descent and connection,² and proves the dates of her father's death, and of her own adoption and enthronement. The queen's works at Karnak consist of two small chapels,³ in which she is represented accompanied by her vizier, Prince Sheshenq, whose name suggests descent from the royal line of the XXIIth dynasty.

Other memorials of this reign are a green basalt statuette with the queen's name and titles;⁴ a stone slab,⁵ a scarab;⁶ the records of some officials, and the sarcophagus in which she was buried at Thebes. At some subsequent period it had been usurped, and the inscriptions on it do not all refer to the queen.⁶ Her tomb is at Deir el-Medineh, and from it the sarcophagus was taken in 1833. It is now in the British Museum.⁷

After Ankhnes-nefer-ab-ra, no other hereditary princess of Thebes is found. "The female line of the Ramessides, "maintained with such care during six centuries by the high "priests, by the Bubastites, by the Ethiopians, by the Saites, "expired with her."⁸

¹ Cairo M., Room U, 675 a; A.S., V, 84-90.

² L., D, iii, 273 e-h, 274 a, c.

³ Cairo M.

⁴ Berl. M., 2112.

⁵ F.P. Coll.

⁶ P., H.E., iii, 356.

⁷ Rec., xxvi, 50; S. SHARPE, Eg. Antiq. in B.M., 104-185.

⁸ M.'s M.R., 759.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

One looks in vain for any further details of the queen ; she had administered the Theban state during the decaying age of Egypt's greatness ; had held her office through war and invasion , had submitted to official marriage with the foe of her house ; and during the reign of his successor, Psamtek III., she still appears in power, and probably died about 525. It is scarcely likely that she lived to be dethroned by Cambyses' conquest, as by that time she would have been ninety-five years of age. It may, therefore, be assumed that she died in full possession of the power and titles which no daughter of hers, either real or adopted, was destined ever to inherit.

So vanishes the last Queen of Thebes, the last royal heiress of the Pharaohs, and with her closes the most extraordinary history of the legal status of a country's womankind that the world has ever known.¹

¹ The Greek queens of the Ptolemaic period, and those queens who held royal titles in Ethiopia at a time when that line no longer ruled in Egypt, do not come within the scope of this volume, which deals only with the native princesses.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

UNPLACED QUEENS.

The names of a few queens who have not been surely placed, remain to be noticed.

AAT-SHET is an unknown "Great Royal Wife," whose sole record is a scarab inscribed with her name and title; it is in the collection of Mr. T. M. Davis, and is published by Mr. Percy E. Newberry. (S.B.A., 1903.)*

NEBT-NEHAT is another new queen whom Mr. Newberry puts on record. She is named as "Hereditary Princess," and "Great Royal Wife," on the fragments of an alabaster jar now in Lord Amherst's collection. (S.B.A., 1903.)

MERY-NEB-ES is a queen recorded on a fragment of black basalt in Cairo. The style of cutting suggests the XXVIth dynasty as her date; otherwise unknown. (P.E.N. in S.B.A., 1905).

KHADEB-NEIT-AR-BET, another unknown queen, whose tomb is at Sakka. The lid of her sarcophagus and four canopic jars have been found, but contain no inscription by which she can be identified. On the slight evidence of a broken ushabti of King Nekht-hor-heb, which was found in her tomb, she has been attributed to his reign, in the XXXth dynasty. (B., R., i, 8; M.D., 95, cf.)

KING LIST.

Predynastic.

"THE SCORPION KING."

Narmer.

Dynasty I.

THIS. Before 4000 B.C.

Mena.

Teta.

Ateth.

Ata.

Hesepti.

Mer-ba-pen.

Semen-ptah.

Kebhu.

Dynasty II.

THIS. Before 4000 B.C.

Neterbau.

Kakau.

Ba-en-neter.

Uaznes.

Senda.

Neferkara.

Zefa.

Zaza.

Dynasty III.

MEMPHIS. Before 3500 B.C.

Neb-ka-ra

Zezer.

Teta.

Ahtes.

Sezes.

Heni.

Dynasty IV.

MEMPHIS. Before 3500 B.C.

Sneferu.

Khufu.

Khafra.

Menka

Radad.

Shepses-kaf.

Sebek-ka-ra.

Imhetep.

Dynasty V.

ELEPHANTINE. Before
3000 B.C.

User-kaf.

Sahu-ra.

Nefer-ar-ka-ra.

Shepses-ka-ra.

Nefer-f-ra.

Ra-en-usr.

Men-kau-hor.

Dad-ka-ra.

Urfas.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Dynasty VI.

ELEPHANTINE. Before
3000 B.C.

Teta.
User-ka-ra.
Pepi I.
Mer-en-ra.
Pepi II.
Mehti-em-saf.
Neter-ka-ra.
Net-aqerti.

Dynasties VII-VIII.

MEMPHIS.

(Uncertain and involved.
Many names.)

Dynasties IX-X.

HERAKLEOPOLIS.

Khati.
Khian.
(And several names.)

Dynasty XI.

THEBES. About 3000 B.C.

Antefa.
Mentuhetep I.
Mentuhetep II.
Mentuhetep III.
Rase-ankh-ka.

Dynasty XII.

THEBES. About 2700 B.C.

Amenemhat I.
Usertsen I.

Amenemhat II.
Usertsen II.
Usertsen III.
Amenemhat III.
Amenemhat IV.
Sebek-neferura.

Dynasty XIII.

THEBES. Before 2000 B.C.

Sekhem-ka-ra.
Sebek-hetep I.
Ra-smørkh-ka.
Sebek-hetep II.
Nefer-hetep.
Sebek-hetep III.
Aa-ab.
Nehesi.
Sebek-em-sauf I.
Sebek-em-sauf II.
(And several other names.)

Dynasty XIV.

XOIS.

Sebek-em-sauf.
(And about 40 names.)

Dynasties XV-XVI.

Between 1900 and 1700 B.C.

THE HYKSOS, OR SHEP-HERD KINGS.

Apepa I.
Apepa II.
Dudu-mes.
(And several names.)

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Dynasty XVII.

THEBES. About 1700 B.C.

Antef I.
Antef II.
Antef III.
Antef IV.
Antef V.
Se-kenen-ra I.
Se-kenen-ra II.
Se-kenen-ra III.
Kames.
Se-khent-neb-ra.

Dynasty XVIII.

THEBES. • About 1580 (r)

Āahmes.
Amen-hetep I.
Thotmes I.
Hatshepsut.
Thotmes II.
Thotmes III.
Amen-hetep II.
Thotmes IV.
Amen-hetep III.
Amen-hetep IV.
Ra-smenkh-ka.
Tut-ankh-amen.
Ay.
Horemheb.

Dynasty XIX.

THEBES. About 1328 to 1202.

Ramses I.
Seti I.
Ramses II.

Merenptah.
Seti II.
Amenmeses.
Siptah—Tausert.
Set-nekht.

Dynasty XX.

THEBES. About 1200 to 1100 B.C.

Ramses III.
Ramses IV.
Ramses V.
Ramses VI.
Ramses VII.
Ramses VIII.
Ramses IX.
Ramses X.
Ramses XI.
Ramses XII.

Dynasty XXI.

THEBES. About 1100 to 950 B.C.

Herhor.
Piankhi.
Pinezem I.
Men-kheper-ra.
Nesi-baneb-dadu.
Pinezem II.
Pasebkhanu.
(OF TANIS.)
Nesi-baneb-dadu.
Pasebkhanu I.
Amen-em-apt.
Siamen.
Pasebkhanu II.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Dynasty XXII.

BUBASTIS. About 950 B.C.

Sheshenq I.

Uasarkon I.

Takeleth I.

Uasarkon II.

Sheshenq II.

Takeleth II.

Sheshenq III.

Pamay.

Sheshenq IV.

Dynasty XXIII.

BUBASTIS. About 750 B.C.

Pedubast.

Uasarkon III.

Dynasty XXIV.

SAIS.

Bakenrant.

Dynasty XXV.

ETHIOPIAN DOMINION.

About 748 to 664 B.C.

Pankhy I.

Kashta.

Shabaka.

Shabataka.

Pankhy II.

Men-kheper-ra.

Taharqa.

Tanutamen.

Dynasty XXVI.

SAIS. About 664 to 525 B.C.

Psamtek I

Necho II.

Psamtek II.

Haa-ab-ra. (Apries.)

Aahmes II. (Amasis.)

Psamtek III.

Dynasty XXVII.

PERSIAN. 525 to 405 B.C.

Cambyses.

Darius I.

Xerxes I.

Artaxerxes I.

Xerxes II.

Sogdianus.

Darius II.

Artaxerxes II.

Dynasty XXVIII.

SAIS. 405 to 400 B.C.

Amartyaeus.

Dynasty XXIX.

MENDES. 399 to 378 B.C.

Neferites.

Hakar.

P-si-mut.

Dynasty XXX.

SEBENNYTOS. 378 to 342

B.C.

Nectanebus I.

Zehar.

Nectanebus II.

Dynasty XXXI.

PERSIA. 342 to 332 B.C.

Artaxerxes III.

Arses.

Darius III.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Dynasty XXXII.
Conquered by Alexander the Great 331 B.C.

Dynasty XXXIII.
GREECE. 323 to 30 B.C.
Ptolemy I. Soter.
Ptolemy II. Philadelphus.
Ptolemy III. Euergetes.
Ptolemy IV. Philopater.
Ptolemy V. Epiphanes.

Ptolemy VI. Eupator.
Ptolemy VII. Philo-meter.
Ptolemy VIII. Eupator.
Ptolemy IX. Euergetes.
Ptolemy X. Lathyrus.
Ptolemy XI. Alexander.
Ptolemy XII. Alexander.
Ptolemy XIII. Auletes.
Ptolemy XIV.
Ptolemy XV.
Cleopatra VII.

QUEEN LIST.

Dynasty I.
Neith-hetep.
Shesh.
Mer-neit.

Dynasty
Ne-maat-hap.

Dynasty IV.
Mertitefs.
Meri-se-ankh.

Dynasty V.
Nefer-hetep-es.
Kaka-hekenu.

Dynasty VI.
Meri-ra-ankhnes.
Amtes
Nitaqert.

Dynasty XI.
Aām.
Aāh.

Aashait.
Neferu.
Tumem
Shertsat
Sent.
Mentu-hetep.

Dynasty XII.
Neb-kau-ra.
Nefert. •
Nefert-hent.
Merseker.
Nub-hetep-takrudit.
Anket-nefert-uben.
Nub-em-ant.
Ptah-neferu.
Sebek-neferu-ra.

Dynasty XIII.
Auhet-abu.
Nenna, or Anna.
Kema.
Senb-sen

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Za—n.
Ha-ankh-s.
Nub-em-hat.
Nub-kha-es.
Khensu.
Sat-sebek.

Dynasty XIV.

Khensu-ankt.
Nub-hetep-tusar.
Senb-hena-es.
Nefert.

Dynasty XVII.

Teti-shera.
Sebek-em-sa-es.
Aah-hetep I.

Dynasty XVIII.

Aahmes Nefertari.
Anhapu.
Thent-hapi.
Aah-hetep II.
Meryt-amen.
Sat-kames.
Hent-tamehu.
Turs.
Senseneb.
Aahmes.
Mut-nefert.
Hatshepsut.
Neferu-ra.
Meryt-ra Hatshepsut.
Sat-aah.
Neb-s-ma.
Tiāa.
Mut-em-ya.

Nebtu.
Thiy.
Sat-amen.
Gilughipa.
Tadukhipa.
Nefertiti.
Merit-aten.
Ankh-es-en-aten.
Tŷ.
Mut-nezemet.

Dynasty XIX.

Sitra.
Tuāa.
Nefertari-meri-en-mu
Ast-nefert.
Bant-antā.
Meryt-amen.
Nebt-taui.
Maat-neferu-ra.
Ast-nefert II.
Ta-khat.
Bakt-urnuro.
Tausert.
Thyi-mer-en-ast.

Dynasty XX.

Ast-amasereth.
Nub-khesdeb.
Nefert-tera.
Thiti.

Dynasty XXI.

Nezemt.
Thent-amen.
Hent-taui I.
Makeri.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Astemkheb I.
 Hent-taui II.
 Astemkheb II.
 Nesikhonsu.
 Nesita-neb-asheru

Dynasty XXII.

Ka-ra-maat,
 Thent-sa.
 Tashed-konsu.
 Hent-taui III.
 Mutemhat Kargmama.
 Ka-ra-ma.
 Mehtienusekt.
 Shepenapt I.
 Nesi-neb-asheru.
 Thent-amen-apt.

Dynasty XXIII.

Ta-du-bast.

Dynasty XXV.

ETHIOPIAN DOMINION.
 Kenensat.

Shepenapt II.
 Pebathma.
 Amenertas.
 Peksaether
 Akaluka.
 Amendukhat.
 Qelhatat.
 Gerarheni.
 Meit-tafnouit.

Dynasty XXVI.

Shepenapt III.
 Mehtienusekt.
 Nitaqert.
 Takhuat.
 Thent-kheta.
 Nekht-sebastru.
 Ankhnes-nefer-ab-ra.

Unplaced.

Aat-shet.
 Nebt-nehat.
 Mery-neb-es.
 Khadeb-neit-ar-het.

LIST OF REFERENCE ABBREVIATIONS.

A.B.	Arundale and Bonomi Gallery, British Museum.
A.B. Cat.	Alnwick Bich Catalogue.
A.M....	Ashmolean Museum.
Am. Coll.	Amherst Collection
Am. P.	Amherst Papyrus.
Arch. Rep., E.E.F.	Archæological Report, Egypt. Exploration Fund.
A.S.	Annales du Service.
A.Z	Aeg. Zeitschrift.
B.E.	Baedeker's Egypt.
B., E.P.	Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs
Berl. M.	Berlin Museum.
B. and G., M.	Benson and Gourlay, Temple of Mut.
B., H.	Brugsch, History.
B., H.E.	Budge, History Egypt.
B.M....	British Museum.
B., O.D.	Bezold, Oriental Diplomacy.
B., R.	Brugsch, Recueil
B., R.P.	Birch, Rhind Papyri.
B., S.A.	Budge, Sarcoph. Ankhnesneferabra.
B., T	Brugsch, Thesaurus.
B.U.E.	Baedeker's Upper Egypt.
Cairo M.	Cairo Museum.
C., M.	Champollion, Monuments de l'Égypte.
C., N.	Champollion, Notices.
D., M.H.	Darassy, Medinet Habu.
F.A.M.	Florence Arch. Museum.
F.P. Coll.	Flinders Petrie Collection.
G., H. Coll.	Golenischeff, Hermitage Collection.
I.H.E.	Inscriptions hiéroglyphique copiées en Égypte.
Lb., D.	Lieblein, Dictionary of Names.
L., D.	Lepsius, Denkmahler.
L., D.T.	Lepsius, Denkmahler Texte.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

L, K.	Lepsius, Königsbuch.
L.M.	Louvre Museum.
L., R.C.	Lieblein, Recherches sur la Chron. E ^g t.
L, T.	Lanzone Catalogue, Turin Museum.
M., A.	Mariette, Catalogue Abydos.
M.A.F.	Mission Arch. Franc., Cairo.
M. Coll.	Murch Collection.
M.D.	Monuments Divers.
Mon. Div.	Monuments Divers.
M., F.D.	de Morgan, Fouilles à Dahchour.
M.H.	Meteria Hieroglyphica, 1828.
M.L.	de Morgan, Monuments et Inscriptions.
M., K.	Mariette, Karnak.
M., M.	Mariette, Mastabas.
M., P.B.	Mariette, Papyrus Boulaq.
M., S.	Mariette, Serapeum.
M., S.D.C.	Maspero, Dawn of Civilization.
M.'s E.	Maspero, Enquête Judicair.
M.'s M.R.	Maspero, Monies Royales de Deir el-Bahari.
M.'s P.E.	Maspero, Passing of the Empires.
M.'s Q.C.	Maspero, Quidê Cairo Museum, translation Quibell.
M.'s S.N.	Maspero, Struggle of the Nations.
N., B.	Naville, Bubastis.
N., F.H.	Naville, Festival Hall.
N. and G., Hist. E.	Newberry and Garstang, A Short History of Anct. Egypt.
N., Sc.	Newberry, Scarabs.
N., T.H.	Naville, Tomb of Hâtshopsitû.
N., Y.	Naville, Tel el-Yehudiyeh.
P., A.	Petrie, Tel el-Amarna.
P and C., E.	Perrot and Chipiez, Egypt.
P, H.	Petrie, Hawara.
P., H.E.	Petrie, History of Egypt.
P., H.Sc.	Petrie, Historical Scarabs.
P., I.	Petrie, Illahun.
P., Ins.	Piehl, Inscriptions.
P., K.	Petrie, Kahun.
P., Ks.	Petrie, Koptos.
P., L.	Pierret, Louvre Catalogue.
P., R.	Pierret, Recueil Inscip., Louvre.
Pr., M.	Prisse, Monuments.
P., S.	Petrie, Season 1887.

THE QUEENS OF EGYPT.

P.S.B.A.	Proceedings, Society Biblical Archæology.
P., S.T.	Petrie, Six Temples.
P., T.	Petrie, Tanis.
Q., R.	Quibell, Ramesseum.
R., A.	Rougé, Album Phot. Mission Egypt.
Rec.	Recueil de Travaux Egypte et Assyr.
R., M.	Rougé, Recherches sur les Monuments, etc.
R., N.H.	Rougé, Notices Textes Hieroglyph.
R P.	Records of the Past.
R., S. or R., M.S.	Rosellini, Monumenti Storici.
Sch. Cat	Schiaparelli Catalogue, Florence Arch. Museum.
Tel el-A. Tabs.	Tel el-Amarna Tablets. ?
T.S.B.A.	Transactions, Society Biblical Arch.
Turin M.	Turin Museum.
U.C. Coll.	University College Collection.
v. B. Coll.	von Bissing Collection.
W. Coll.	Ward Collection.
W., G.	Wiedemann, Aeg. Geschichte.
Z.A. or Z.	Zeitschrift Aeg.

INDEX.

- Aah, Queen, 24, 25.
 Aah-dufnekht, 195.
 Aah-hetep, I., II., Queens, 46-48,
 53, 58, 59, 61, 67, 68, 71, 72, 75-
 77, 81, 144, 170.
 Aahmes I., King, 45, 48, 51, 53, 65,
 69, 70-74, 152.
 Aahmes II., 201, 224-227.
 Aahmes, Prince, chief of the archers,
 225.
 Aahmes, Queen, 71, 75-77, 81, 82.
 Aahmes-Nefertari, Queen, 53, 59-
 69, 92.
 Aa-Kheperu Ra (Thotmes II.), 77,
 82.
 Aam, Queen, 24.
 Aa-nekhtu, 149.
 Aashait, Queen, 25.
 Aat-shet, Queen, 230.
 Abbot Papyrus, the, 39, 40, 52, 164,
 165.
 Abd-el-gumah, Sheikh, 64.
 Abd-er-Rassul, Mohammed, 63.
 " Ahmed, 63, 64.
 Abu Simbel, 146, 147, 149-155.
 Abydos, 9, 17-19, 22, 44, 45, 60, 61,
 68, 99, 147, 162, 163, 181, 195-
 198, 206, 207, 210.
 Adon, the god, 109.
 Aga Agad, Moustapha, 64.
 Aha, 6.
 Ai, Prince, 40.
 Airomap-atut, 197.
 Akaluka, Queen, 201, 210-212.
 Amasis, 21.
 Amélineau, M., 5.
 Amen, and Amen-Ra, 23, 23, 52,
 56, 61, 76, 82, 84, 86-88, 91, 96,
 102, 103, 107, 109, 116, 117, 137,
 141, 168, 170, 171, 174, 175, 181-
 186, 188, 189, 192-196, 207, 208,
 216-220, 228.
 Amenna, 37.
 Amendukhat, Queen, 201, 211, 212.
 Amenemapet, Princess, 103, 104.
 Amenemapt, an official, 164.
 Amen-em-hat I., 27.
 Amenemhat II., 27, 28.
 Amenemhat III., 29, 30, 32, 34.
 Amenemhat IV., 34.
 Amenemhat, Governor, 55.
 Amenertas II., and Queen, 201,
 215-225.
 Amen-hetep I., 49, 53, 59-61, 65-
 77, 81.
 Amen-hetep II., 53, 99, 101-103.
 Amen-hetep III., 53, 56, 102, 106-
 137, 140, 168.
 Amen-hetep IV., 34, 94, 109, 114-
 117, 123, 131-135.
 Amen-hetep, high priest, 113, 168,
 170.
 Amenhetep, a steward, 123.
 Amenmeses, 143, 157-161.
 Amenmeses, Prince, 53, 71.
 Amherst Collection, the, 39, 101,
 104, 136, 230.
 Amherst Papyrus, the, 39.
 Amtes, Queen, 18, 19.
 Anhapu, Queen, 53, 69.
 Anibe, 168.
 Anket-Nefert-Uben, Princess, 31.
 Ankh-es-en-aten, Princess, 135.
 Ankhs-es-en-aten, Queen, 53, 137,
 138.
 Ankhnes-nefer-ab-ra, Queen, 201,
 227-229.
 Anna or Nenna, Queen, 36.
 Anput, Prince, 193.
 Antef, King, 46.
 Anuber-rekhu, Prince, 143, 148.
 Anuke, 150.
 Apou, see Isis.
 Apries, see Haa-ab-ra, 201.
 Apt, 208.
 Apu, see Mir.
 Arat, Queen, 102.
 Arit-nefer, Princess, 157.

INDEX.

- Arm, dismembered, found in tomb of King Zer, 8, 9
 Ait, Egyptian, see under Statues and Palaces.
 Art-na, 46.
 Aset, 56, 77, 78, 102.
 Ashes, suicide of Nitocris among, 20
 Ashur-bani-pal, 216.
 Asiatic culture, 108.
 Assaif, 115.
 el-Assaif, 64.
 Assyria, 113, 212, 216.
 Ast, Princess, 53, 143, 164-168.
 Ast-amasereth, Queen, 143, 164.
 Astemkheb, Queen, 169, 181-185.
 Astemkheb I., Queen, 151-153.
 Astemkheb II., Queen, 65, 169,
 185-187, 198
 Astemkheb, Princess, 180.
 Astemkheb, High Priestess, 189.
 Astkhebt, Princess, 227.
 Ast-nefert II., Queen, 143, 157-159.
 Aswan, 18, 36, 89, 95, 97, 152, 153,
 207, 209.
 Ataul, Princess, 187, 188
 Aten, cult of, 116-119, 133.
 Athribis, 202.
 Atmu-nefereu, Princess, 28.
 Au-ef, 46, 47.
 Auget-tatta, Princess, 36.
 Auhet-Abu, Princess, 36.
 Aÿ, 53, 138.

 Ba-en-neter, 4, 10, 11.
 Ba-Neith-Hetep, 6.
 Bab-el-Moluk, 64.
 Babylon, 124-130, 134, 135, 202
 Babylonian Tablets, the, 115, 125.
 Bakt-aten, Princess, 53, 114, 135
 Bakt-ur-nuro, Queen, 143, 159.
 Banishment of Egyptians to the great oasis, 182.
 Bant-anta, Princess, 143, 152, 153,
 154, 156.
 Baptism, Practice of, 82.
 Barocco Collection, 98.
 Bast, the Goddess, 200, 204.
 Bebares, 38.
 Bek-ptah, 197.
 Beka-kamen, the steward, 160.

 Beni Hasan, 55, 95.
 Berbernes, the, 70.
 Belim Collection, the, 41, 93, 96,
 142, 173, 194, 195, 219.
 Bes, the god, 199.
 Bibân el Moluk, 161.
 Binpu, Prince, 48.
 Bitter Lakes, the, 202.
 Boats, 61, 103, 112, 118, 174, 217.
 „ the Neferu-aten, 112, 118.
 „ the Harem of Amen, 217.
 Bologna, 210.
 Book of the Dead, the, 177, 181,
 183.
 Borchardt, Herr, 6.
 Bouriant, M., 108.
 British Museum, 44, 45, 93, 103,
 173, 193, 209, 228.
 Brugsch, Emile, M., 17, 41, 64-66,
 98, 108, 156, 164, 184, 185, 198,
 219.
 Bubastis, 191, 195, 196, 199, 200, 202.
 Budge, Mr., 108, 172.
 Bulak, 66, 67.
 Buraburiash, King of Babylonia,
 126-134, 135.
 Busiris, 202.
 Buto, 82, 95.

 Cairo Museum, 9, 13, 17, 26, 28,
 29, 37, 45, 46, 50, 63, 69, 73, 74,
 76, 77, 93, 96, 99, 114, 121, 122,
 123, 134, 142, 146, 156, 165, 177,
 178, 181, 188, 189, 202, 206, 219,
 223, 230.
 Cambyses, King of Persia, 225, 226,
 229
 Campbell, Major, 63.
 Champollion, M., 154, 172, 181.
 Chantress, Title of, 56, 171.
 Chapel of the Cow, 99.
 Chenemhetep, 55.
 Conspiracy of Thi, the, 165-167.
 Correspondence, between Amen-hetep III. and Dushratta, 126,
 127, 131.
 Correspondence, between the King of Babylon and Khuenaten, 134, 135.
 Correspondence, Tel-el-Amarna letters, between Amen-hetep III. and Kallimasin, 128-130.

INDEX.

- Cushi, the, 166.
 Cyrus, King of Persia, 226.
- Dakhel (Testesu), oasis of, 91.
 Daessy, M., 87.
 Dashur, 29.
 Dattari, M., collection of, 26.
 Davis, T. M., 41, 92, 93, 108, 120, 230.
 Death Punishment, 166, 167.
 Deir el-Bahari, 25, 62, 63, 64, 69, 71, 72, 74, 75, 76, 81, 84, 87, 90, 92, 93, 94, 97, 99, 146, 172, 173, 181, 183, 186, 187, 189.
 Deir-el-Medineh, 68, 72, 228.
 Delta, the, 42, 149, 174, 202.
 Den, King, 9.
 Diodorus, 21, 23, 32.
 Divine Worshipper, title of, 56.
 Drah Abu l'Neggah, 50.
 Dream Stela of Fanutamen, 213.
 Duatnéfert, 38.
 Dusratta, King of Mitanni, 126, 127, 130, 131.
 Dynasties I, 5, 7, 9; II, 4, 9-11; IV, 3, 12-15, 27; V, 16, 17, 16-24; VII-X, 22, 23, 27; XI, 24-27; XII, 27-35, 50, 146; XIII, 36-43; XIV, 42; XVII, 44-52, 170; XVIII, 3, 14, 145, 220; XIX, 143-163; XX, 38, 52, 143, 164-168; XXI, 56, 61, 169-189; XXII, 190-200; XXIII, 200; XXVI, 21, 15, 201, 230; XXX, 230.
- Edfu, 45, 47, 61, 68.
 Edwards, Miss Amelia B., 142.
 Ekhnun, 109, 139, 207.
 El Kab, 71.
 Elephantine, House of, 16, 74, 83, 89.
 Eserhaddon, King, 212, 215.
 Ethiopia, 186, 187, 200-207, 212, 216, 217.
 Euphrates, R., Valley of the, 113.
- Fayûm, the, 29, 31, 35, 202.
 Flinders Petrie Collection, the, 122, see also under Petrie.
 Florence, 188.
 Flowers, Love of, 57.
 Foreign Burial of, 183.
 Foreign Marriage:
 Funeral customs, 15.
 Funeral Dais of Astemkheb I., 184, 185.
 Furniture of the Palaces, 57 see Palaces, Interior of.
- Gabet, M., 50.
 Gagaza, 128.
 Gardens, reference to, 18, 19, 23, 58, 87, 198.
 Gazelle, embalmed, 183.
 Gebel Silsileh, 150.
 Genealogical Tables, 17, 38, 53, 77, 143, 169, 190, 201.
 Gerarheni, Queen, 201, 213.
 Gezer, 194.
 Ghizeh, 12, 13, 14.
 Ghost, the, of Queen Nitocris-Rhodopis, 21, 22.
 Ilughhipa, or Kirghipa, Queen, 53, 125, 126, 132.
 Gurnah, 77, 146, 165, 191, 193.
 Gurneh, 68.
 Gurob, 114, 122.
- Haa-ab-ra, 201, 223-227.
 Haankh-f, 36.
 Ha-ankh-s, Queen, 37.
 Hapi, father of Amenhetep the scribe, 123.
 Harem of Amen, 4.
 Harris Papyrus, the, 167, 168.
 Hathor, the goddess, 25, 55, 56, 62, 82, 89, 90, 96, 99, 149-151, 171, 198, 214.
 Hatshepsut, Queen, 25, 26, 41, 53, 76-98, 102, 140, 142, 159, 160.
 Hawara, 31, 34, 35.
 Hebuan-rozenath, 164.
 Heliopolis, 2, 83, 108, 118, 220.
 Hamamet, 207, 209.
 Henhenet, Princess, 25.
 Hent-ma-ra, Princess, 146.
 Hent-ta-neb, Princess, 53, 114.
 Hent-ta-neh, Princess, 69.
 Hent-tameh, 53.
 Hent-tamchu, Queen, 53, 74.
 Hent-taui, Princess, 148.
 Hent-taui I., Queen, 63, 65, 169, 175-180.
 Hent-taui II., 169, 185.
 Hent-taui III., Queen, 190, 194.

INDEX. 6

- Henut-anu, Princess, 103.
 Herakleopolis, 202.
 Hereditary right of women, 47, 48.
 Herhor, King, 61, 63, 169-176, 179, 203.
 Hermopolis, 202, 204, 205.
 Herodotus, 5, 6, 14, 15, 19, 21, 34, 225, 226.
 Heru-nefer, Prince, 26.
 Hetep, 55.
 Hibbeh-el, fortress of, 181, 182.
 Hierakonpolis, 47.
 Hmcks, 108.
 Hor, King, 30.
 Horemheb, 53, 139-143, 145, 182.
 Horemheb, the scribe, 104.
 Horhetep, the steward, 181.
 Horpasen, 193, 194, 196, 198.
 Horses of King Pankhy, 205.
 Horshemsu, 5, 6.
 Horsiaet, High Priest, 220.
 Horsiaet, Prince, 190, 199, 224.
 Horus, 6, 82, 91, 141, 158, 171, 181, 184, 204, 224.
 Humazery, Queen, 164, 165.
 Huy, the steward, 119, 122.
 Hyksos, the, 42, 46, 59, 62.
 Hymn to Aten, 118, 119.

 Ibe, an official, 222.
 Ibrim, 168.
 Inter-marriages, 3, 19, 38, 71, and many references.
 Ishtar, the goddess, 126, 131.
 Isis, 44, 51, 62, 91, 171, 181, 184.
 Israel, Children of, 42, 156.
 Iuaa, 107-109, 112, 121, 124.

 Jewels on mummies, 8, 9, 29, 30, 40, 50, 51, 58, 73, 134, 135, 156.
 Josephus, 42.
 "Judicial Papyrus," the, 166.

 Ka, the, 21, 82, 180, 183.
 Kab-el, 40, 95, 103.
 Kaka-hekeru, Queen, 16.
 Kallimasin, King of Babylonia, 126, 128-130, 132.
 Kamal, Ahmed Effendi, 64, 66.
 Kamara, name of, 91.
 Kames, King, 48-53.
 Ka-ra-ma, Queen, 190-199.

 Ka-ra-maat, Queen, 190-199.
 Karamat, Princess, 196.
 Karnak, 22, 34, 36, 52, 61, 68, 76, 84, 88, 90-101, 141, 142, 154, 172, 176-179, 181, 192-196, 199, 206, 208, 210, 211, 216, 217, 219.
 Karo-mama, Queen, 194, 195.
 Kashta, King, 201, 205, 206, 207.
 Katsashni, 56.
 Kaut, Princess, 25.
 Kema, Queen, 36, 37.
 Kemsit, Princess, 25.
 Kenaru, Prince, 48.
 Kench, 64.
 Kench, Mudir of, 50.
 Kenensat, Queen, 201, 204.
 Khadeb-neit-ar-bet, Queen, 23.
 Khaemuas, Prince, 143, 152, 153.
 Rhaflra, King, 12, 14.
 Khanigabbi, 128.
 Khasekhemui, King, 10.
 Khataaneh, 26, 35.
 Khebt-neferu, Princess, 53, 76, 79, 90.
 Khemnis, 207.
 Khensu-Ankt, Queen, 40, 41.
 Khent, Land of, 149.
 Kheta, the, 104, 154, 155.
 Kheta, Prince of, 143.
 Khnum, 83.
 Khnumit Amen Hatshopsitu, 83.
 Khonsu, King, 38, 41, 56, 61, 172, 175, 176, 181, 208.
 Khu-amen, 197.
 Khua, 17.
 Khuenaten-Amen-hetep IV., 109-111, 115-118, 145.
 Khufu, King, 12, 14, 225.
 Kings, List of, 231.
 Kirghipa, or Gilughipa, Queen, 125, 126, 132.
 Knossos, 102.
 Kom Ombo, 95.
 Koptos, 37, 168.
 Kush (or Ethiopia), 186, 203.

 Labels, wooden, instance of, 104.
 Labyrinth, the, 34, 35.
 Ladders of Incense, the, 86.
 Lake made for Queen Thy, in Zalu, 112.
 Lauth, Herr, 108.
 Lee, Mr., 166.

INDEX.

- Legends and Stories—Aahmes and Teti-shera, 45; Adoption of Nitaqert, 220-222; Appearance of Amen and Horus to Horemheb, 141; Akaluka and Taharqa, 211; Betrothal of Kallimasin, 129, 130; Birth of Amen-hetep III., 102; Birth of Hatshepsut, 82; The Conspiracy of Thi and Pentaurt, 165-167; The Daughter of Men-kau-Ra, 14, 15; The Daughter of Menkheper-Ra, 214; The Erection of the Temple to Aten, 118; The Expedition of Hatshepsut to the Ladders of Incense, 86, 87; The Ghost of Rhodopis, 21, 22; The Grave of Naromath, 196, 197; Horemheb and Horus, 141; The Horses of King Pankhy, 205; The Intercession of Nes-thent-nes, 204, 205; Lake Moëus and its Fish, 33; Nitetis and Cambyses, 225; Nitocris and the Drowning of the Banqueters, 20; Osiris, 44; The Property of Queen Karamata, 191-193; Ptah and Ramses II, 155; The Sandal of Rhodopis, 21; Trial of Queen Amtes, 18; Trial of Thi and the Conspirators, 166.
- Legrain, M., 68, 101, 142, 213, 221, 228.
- Leontopolis, 202.
- Lepsius, M., 40, 93, 154, 172, 196.
- Lctopolis, 202.
- Libya, supposed nationality of Thy, 108.
- Loret, M., 99.
- Louvre, the, 36, 37, 38, 63, 68, 73, 117, 150, 152, 154, 158, 173, 188, 195, 204, 219.
- Luxor, 34, 50, 53, 64, 66, 102, 103, 107, 148, 150, 154, 173, 179, 202, 213.
- Ma, the, 196, 197.
- Maat-Nefetu-Ra, Queen, 143, 154-157.
- Maferi Mut-em-hat, Queen, 169, 176-181.
- Makt-aten, Princess, 53, 133, 134, 135.
- Male attire, instances of queens in, 83, 84.
- Manetho, 5, 6, 22, 42.
- Mariette, M., 50, 52, 63, 99, 108, 142, 178.
- Masaherta, High Priest, 169, 179, 181, 184.
- Masaherta, son of Nesikonsa, 187, 188.
- Maspero, M., 47, 59, 63, 68, 101, 103, 108, 109, 142, 170, 172, 176.
- Massarah, 59.
- Medical Papyrus, the Ebers, 7, 8.
- Medicine, Practice of, 8.
- Medinet Habu, temple of, 98, 114, 124, 145, 176, 178, 179, 209, 219, 220, 224.
- Medûm, 13, 14.
- Memnon, statues of, 103, 113, 114.
- Memnonium, the, 90.
- Memphis, 7, 13, 21, 22, 118, 149, 153, 203, 207, 209, 212, 215, 221, 225.
- Mena, King, 5, 6, 7, 8, 23, 27.
- Mendes, 202.
- Men-ka-ra Netaqueiti, or Nitocris, Queen, 19-22.
- Men-kau-Ra, King, 14, 20, 21.
- Men-kheper-ia, King, 39, 169, 176.
- Menkheper-ra, High Priest, 179, 182, 183, 214.
- Menthu, 83.
- Ment, Princess, 29.
- Mentuemhat, 216.
- Mentuheteps, the, 24, 36.
- Mentu-hetep II, King, 24.
- Mentu-hetep III., King, 24, 25, 26, 36, 85.
- Mentu-hetep, Queen, 26.
- Mentu-Ra, 208.
- Mchtienusekht I., Queen, 190, 196-199.
- Mehtienusekh, II., 201, 219, 220.
- Merenatef, priest, 162, 163.
- Meremtah, 143, 152, 157, 158, 159.
- Meren-ra, King, 17.
- Meri, Princess, 156.
- Meri-ra-ankhnes, Queen, 16-18.
- Meri-se-Ankh, Queen, 13, 14.

INDEX.

- Merit, Princess, 29.
 Merit-aten, Queen, 53, 136, 137
 Merit-aten, Princess, 133, 134.
 Merit-tafnout, Queen, 213, 214.
 Merneit, Queen, 9.
 Merris, Princess, 156.
 Merseker, Queen, 29.
 Meritiefs, Queen, 12, 13.
 Meryt-amen, 53, 60, 67, 72, 99, 143,
 148, 153, 154.
 Mery-neb-es, Queen, 230.
 Meryt-ptah, Princess, 103.
 Meryt-ra, Queen, 53, 77, 80, 97-100.
 Mesopotamia, 113.
 Metesouphis II., King, 19, 20.
 Methen, 10.
 Meyer, Hen., 108.
 Min of Anpu, 109, 171, 181, 184.
 Mitanni, 108, 115, 125, 126.
 Moeris, Lake, 33.
 Morgan, de, M., 5, 29, 30.
 Moses, 156.
 Moutafian Tadrus, 64, 66.
 Murch Collection, 173.
 Mut, the Goddess, 56, 61, 67, 68,
 122, 142, 150, 157, 171, 175, 176,
 209, 217.
 Mut, Sistrum of, 157.
 Mutardus, Princess, 214.
 Mut-ar-ra-hent-neferu, Queen, 215.
 Mutemhat, Karomama, Queen, 180,
 190, 194, 195.
 Mutemua, Queen, 53, 102, 103, 107.
 Mut-hez-ankhs, Queen, 198.
 Mut-kha-nefera Amenertas, Queen,
 206-210.
 Mutnefert, Queen, 53, 76, 77, 79.
 Mut-nefertari, Queen, 143.
 Mut-nezemet, Queen, 53, 133, 139-
 143.
 Mycerinus, see Men-kau-ra, 14.
 Napata, 203, 211, 213, 217.
 Narmal, King, 6.
 Naromath, Prince, 190, 196-198.
 Naucratis, 21.
 Naville, M., 84, 85, 87, 90.
 Neb-Amen, a steward, 39, 104.
 Neb-em-akhet, Prince, 14.
 Neb-hetep-tusar, Queen, 41.
 Neb-Ka-Rau, Princess, 28.
 Neb-ma-Ra, 114.
 Nebseni, 65.
 Nebseny, a scribe, 169, 175, 176,
 177.
 Neb-s-ma, Queen, 100.
 Nebt, Princess, 17.
 Nebta, Princess, 71.
 Nebt-ant, Princess, 37.
 Nebt-nehat, Queen, 230.
 Nebt-tau, Princess, 153, 154.
 Nebt-tau, Queen, 143.
 Nebtu, Queen, 53, 104.
 Nebunnef, high priest, 148.
 Nechabit, 184.
 Necho II., 201, 220, 223.
 Nefer-ar-ka-ra, King, 16.
 Neferamen, Princess, 103.
 Nefer-hetep, King, 36.
 Nefer-Hetep-es, Queen, 16.
 Nefer-neferu-aten, Princess.
 Nefer-neferu-aten Neferiti, Queen,
 131-136.
 Nefer-neferu-aten, Princess, 135.
 Neferushusha, Princess, 25.
 Nefert-tera, Queen, 168.
 Nefert, Princess, 13.
 Nefert, Queen, 41, 42.
 Nefert-Hent, Queen, 28-30.
 Nefertari, Queen, 44, 45, 48, 49, 53,
 58, 65, 70-73, 81.
 Nefertari-met-en-mut, Queen, 147-
 151.
 Nefertiti, Queen, 53, 123, 140,
 141.
 Neferu, Queen, 20, 47.
 Neferu-Ra, Princess, 80.
 Neferuaten, 53.
 Neferura, Queen, 53, 90, 96, 97.
 Negada, 6.
 Neharina, see Mitanni, 125.
 Neith-Hetep, Queen, 5, 6, 227.
 Neitmartefs, Princess, 227.
 Nekht-hor-heb, King, 230.
 Nekht-sebastu, Queen, 201, 225-
 227.
 Ne-Maat-Hap, Queen, 10.
 Nemart, Prince, 190, 195.
 Neuna, or Anna, Queen, 36.
 Nesibadadu, 169.
 Nesibanebdadu, High Priest, 183,
 185, 186.

INDEX.

- Nesi-ba-neš-dadu, Prince, 169, 174
 Nesikhonsu, Queen, 169, 186-189.
 Nesinebasheru, Queen, 190, 199.
 Nesitanebasheru, Queen, 169, 187, 188, 189.
 Nes-thent-nes, wife of Nimrod, 204, 205.
 Neterket, King, 10.
Neter tuat, office of, 56
 Ne-user-ra, King, 16.
 Newberry, Mr., 40, 41, 230
 Nezemt, Queen, 63, 169, 171, 172, 177, 179.
 Nifur, 197.
 Nile, R., 6, 20, *and several references.
 Nimrod, King of Heliopolis, 204, 205.
 Nitaqert, Princess, 218, 219.
 Nub-em-hat, Mutneb-Nefert, Queen, 201, 218-224, 227.
 Nubtis, Princess, 225, 226.
 Nitocris, Queen, 19-22.
 Nu, 91.
 Nub-Em-Ant, Princess, 31.
 Nub-em-hat, Queen, 37.
 Nub-hetep-takrudit, Queen, 30.
 Nubia, 113, 213.
 Nub-kha-es, Queen, 37-40.
 Nubkhesdeb, Queen, 168.

 Oasis, the Great, 182.
 Obelisks of Hatshepsut, 88, 89.
 Omm el Gaab, 9.
 Onion parings in embalming, 187
 Oryx Nome, 55.
 Osiris, 44, 150, 154, 181, 183, 186, 196-198, 208-210, 219, 224.
 Ouserhat, Tomb of, 115.
 Ox, the wooden ox of the tomb of Men-kau-ra's daughter, 14, 15.
 Oxford, Ashmolean Museum, 37.

 Pacht, the Goddess, 90.
 Paher, tomb of, 71.
 Palaces, Interior of, 31, 57, 110, 111, 134, 222.
 Panbesa, the writer, 149.
 Pankhy I., 201-205.
 Pankhy II., 201, 207, 208, 215.
 Parrish Collection, the, 180
 Pasebkhanau, King of Tanis, 178, 181.
 Pasebkhanu I., 169.
 Pasebkhanu II., 189-194
 Pasenkhonsu, Prince, 225.
 Pasopd, 202
 Pebathma, Queen, 201, 206, 210.
 Pedubast, 200.
 Pekersala, 210
 Peksather, Princess, 206.
 Peksather, Queen, 201, 210
 Pennat, an official, 168.
 Pentaurt, Prince, 165, 167.
 Pepi I., King, 16-18.
 Pepi II., 17-19.
 Pepi-ankhnes, see Meri-ra-ankhnes, 17.
 Per-nub, 37.
 Perabsen, King, 10.
 Persen, 16.
 Persen, 225-227.
 Petahuha, Princess, 103.
 *Petenit, a prophet, 225.
 Petersburg, 206, 225.
 Petrie, Mr., reference to, 2, 5, 6, 9, 3, 31, 34, 40, 77, 90, 96, 97, 101, 102, 104, 108, 112, 120, 124, 132, 136, 142, 146, 152, 156, 157, 159, 172, 198, 219.
 Piankh, Prince, 169, 172, 178.
 Piehl, Herr, 181
 Pinezem I., 71, 169, 173, 177-179.
 Pinezem II., 169, 179, 183, 185, 186, 187, 188.
 Pinezem, grandson? of Pinezem I., 179
 Pinezem, High-Priest, 63.
 Poem of Menkhepei-Ra, addressed to his daughter Mutardus, 214.
 Poinatum, recipe of Queen Shesh, 7.
 Prayer, records of, 133, 134, 181, 182, 197, 208, 209.
 Priest-Kings, see Herhor.
 Priesthood, Power of the, 117, 170, 171
 Psammeticus, 21.
 Psamtek I., 201, 210, 214, 215, 216-219.
 Psamtek II., 201, 221-224, 227.
 Psamtek III., 224, 229.
 Ptah, the god, 155, 225.
 Ptah-Neferu, Princess, 31-33.

INDEX.

- Punt, the Land of, Expedition of Hatshepsut to, 85, 87.
 Pyramids, 13, 20, 29, 31-33, 38-40
- Qelhatal, Queen, 201, 213.
 Queens, List of, 235.
 Queens, unplaced, List of, 230.
 Quft, 66.
- Ra, 2, 91, and see also Amen.
 Ra-hetep, the General, 13.
 Ra-se-ankh, King, 41.
 Rai, the Lady, 70
 Rames, Prince, 48.
 Ramesseum, the, 146.
 Ramses I., 69, 143-145.
 Ramses II., 69, 94, 143, 145, 146, 151-153.
 Ramses III., 67, 143, 161-164.
 Ramses VI., 143, 164-168.
 Ramses IX., 38, 62, 143.
 Ramses X., 143, 165.
 Ramses XII., 143, 173, 175, 188.
 Ramses, second son of Ramses I., 143, 152.
 Rayet, M., 108.
 Reference abbreviations, List of, 238.
 Reis Mohammed, 66.
 Reshut, land of, 91.
 Rhind, M., 103, 104.
 Rhodopis, 21.
 Rhodopis-Nitocris, Queen, 21.
 Rogers, Bey, 63.
 Rollin, M., 166.
 Rome, Temple of Isis, 98
 Rouge, M. de, 172.
- Sa-Amen, Prince, 60.
 Sa-amen, Princess, 68.
 Sacerdotal Titles, 56.
 Sadhe, Princess, 25.
 Sahura, King, 16.
 Said, the, 70.
 Said Pasha, 50.
 Sais, 5, 6, 15, 202, 214, 215, 224, 225.
 Sakkara, 16, 17, 230.
 Sandal of Nitocris-Rhodopis, the, 21.
 Sa-pa-ir, Prince, 60, 62, 68.
 Sat-aah, Queen, 53, 60.
- Sat-Amen, Queen, 53, 57, 123-126.
 Sat-Amen, Princess, 60, 68, 100, 114, 152.
 Sat-ap, 55.
 Satharna, King of Mitanni, 1 126
 Sat-hathor, Princess, 28, 29, 30.
 Sathora, Princess, 103.
 Satirbau, Princess, 48
 Sat-Kames, Queen, 72, 73.
 Sat-Kames, Princess, 58, 60, 67, 68.
 Sat-sebek, Queen, 41.
 Satum, Prince, 104.
 Saulcy, M. de, 63
 Scarabs, of Amenhetep III, 107.
 Schiapparel
 Sculpture, 107.
 Sebek, the God, 35.
 Sebekdudu, 38.
 Sebek-em-heb, Princess, 37.
 Sebek-em-sa-es, Queen, 45, 46, 47, 49.
 Sebek-em-sau, King, 37, 38.
 Sebek-hetep I., 26.
 Sebek-hetep II., 36.
 Sebek-hetep III., 37.
 Sebek-hetep IV., 37.
 Sebek-neferu-Ra, Queen, 32-35.
 Sebennytos, 202.
 Sed festival, the, 88
 Sedeinga, 113, 122.
 Sehel, 36.
 Sekhet, 176.
 Semekh-ka-ra, 53, 136.
 Semneh, 29.
 Senb-sen, Queen, 35.
 Send-hena-ef, vizier, 26
 Senmut, the architect, 89, 94, 96
 Senseneb, 53, 55, 74, 75, 77, 81, 90.
 Sent, Queen, 26.
 Sent-es-senb, Queen, 28, 29.
 sentinery, Princess, 227
 Se-quen-en-ra III., 46, 48, 53, 58, 65, 70.
 Set, 44.
 Setep-en-ra, Prince, 50, 135.
 Seti I., 22, 65, 69, 94, 143.
 Seti II., 143, 154, 157, 162

INDEX.

- Seti, son of Ramses, 143, 144, 145, 146, 148.
 Set-nekht, 143, 157, 161-163.
 Shabaco, Prince, 206.
 Shabaka, 201, 207, 208, 212, 213.
 Shamash, 131.
 Shapennapit, 221.
 Sheikh-abd-el-Gurnah, 63, 64.
 Shepenapt, Princess, 208.
 Shepenapt I., Queen, 195, 196, 199.
 Shepenapt II., Queen, 190, 201, 206, 207.
 Shepenapt III., Queen, 201, 212, 213, 215-219.
 Shepherd Kings, the, 42, 46, see Hyksos, the.
 Shertsat, Queen, 26.
 Shesh, Queen, 7, 8.
 Shesheng II., 198.
 Shesheng III., 190-195, 199, 200.
 Shesheng, Prince, 190, 193, 196, 228.
 Si-amen, Prince, 63.
 Silsileh, 24, 152, 153.
 Sinai, mines of, 89.
 Sinai, shrine of Hathor, 90, 95, 96, 154.
 Siptah, King, 143, 157, 158, 160-162.
 Sitra, Queen, 143-145, 154, 159-161.
 Skhent-neb-ra, 48, 53.
 Sneferu, King, 10, 12, 14.
 Solar race, the, 3.
 Soleh, 114, 122.
 Solomon, King, 194.
 Somali Land, location of Land of Punt in, 86.
 Speos Artemidos, the, 90.
 Sphinxes, 32, 35.
 Spirits, Belief in, 8, 22, 44, 45.
 Statues and busts, 12, 13, 14, 27, 28, 77, 78, 96, 98, 101, 103, 113, 114, 142, 145, 146, 149-151, 153, 155, 156, 158, 165, 176, 177, 193, 197, 198, 206, 208, 209.
 Straits, 31.
 Suez, 63.
 Suicide, Force, Instance of, 166, of Nitocris, 20.
 Sukharte, Princess, 128-130.
 Syna, 108, 125, 126.
 Ta-du-bast, Queen, 200.
 Tadukhipa, Queen, 53, 130, 131.
 Taharqa, 201, 210, 211, 215, 216, 218.
 Tahennu, the, 91.
 Tahonit-tauti, 169, 186, 188.
 Tahnun, the god, 150.
 Takhait, the Princess, 53, 114, 124, 143, 201.
 Ta-khat, Queen, 158.
 Takhedka, Princess, 48.
 Takeleth I., 129, 194, 195, 199.
 Takeleth II., 90, 199.
 Takheta, Princess, 103, 104.
 Takhetauti, Princess, 103.
 Takhuat, Queen, 224, 227.
 Tanis, 28, 146, 154, 155, 169, 173-175, 190-195, 211.
 Tanutamem, 201, 213.
 Tasha-kheper, Princess, 196.
 Tashed Khonsu, Queen, 190, 194.
 Taurt, the god, 150.
 Tausert, Queen, 143, 158, 159.
 Tautha, Queen, 42.
 Tel el-Amarna, 108, 111, 114, 115, 119, 122, 123, 126, 127, 134, 139.
 Tel el-Amarna tablets, the, 108.
 Tell el-Yehudiyeh, 156.
 Temples, Descriptions of, 25, 34, 85, 88, 118, 149, 160.
 Tep, 82.
 Testesu (Dakfel), oasis of, 91.
 Teta, King, 7.
 Teti-shera, Queen, 44, 45, 60.
 Tewfik, Khedive, 64.
 Thaa, Princess, 103, 104.
 Thebes, 2, 23, 25, 38, 44, 45, 56, 60, 61, 63, 64, 65, 69, 82, 83, 87, 89, 95, 98, 100, 101, 103, 104, 113, 115-117, 120, 122, 134, 137-139, 141, 145-148, 154, 156, 157, 160, 169, 170, 178, 180, 181, 186, 196, 198, 203, 206-211, 216-229.
 Thent-amen, Queen, 169, 173-175.
 Thent-amen-apt, Queen, 190, 199, 200.
 Thent-hapi, Queen, 53, 70, 74.
 Thent-khetu, Queen, 201, 224, 225.

INDEX.

- Thentsa, Queen, 190, 194.
 Thentspeh, Princess, 198.
 Thi, 165-167.
 Thinis, 207.
 Thiti, Queen, 168.
 Thi, Queen, 53, 56, 100, 106-124, 130-135, 142, 168.
 Thoth, the god, 76, 87.
 Thotmes I., 49, 53, 55, 74-84, 88, 90, 92, 93, 96, 100.
 Thotmes II., 53, 65, 76-80, 84, 85, 90, 92, 93, 159.
 Thotmes III., 29, 53, 56, 77, 78, 80, 81, 92-101.
 Thotmes IV., 53, 101-104, 107, 140.
 Thotmes, son of Thiys, 114
 Thuaa, 53, 107-109, 112, 121, 124.
 Thuois, Queen, 161.
 Thyi-merenast, Queen, 143, 162, 163.
 Ti, keeper of the pyramids, 16.
 Tiaa, Queen, 53, 100, 101.
 Titles, curious, 1, 4, 5, 10, 18, 19, 25, 26, 28-30, 32, 37, 45-47, 54-56, 60, 68, 71-75, 79, 84, 89, 98-101, 107, 131, 132, 138, 147, 151, 153, 158, 168, 170, 171, 175, 181, 186, 187, 203, 211.
 Tombs, opening of, 6, 8, 9, 30-40, 49-52, 62-70, 73, 92, 93, 104, 108, 120, 165, 173, 194.
 Tuaa, Queen, 143, 145, 146, 148.
 Tum, 82, 83.
 Tumem, Queen, 26.
 Turah, 59.
 Turin Museum, the, 19, 68, 122, 140, 142, 150, 166, 206.
 Turin Papyrus, the, 19.
 Turs, Queen, 53, 72.
 Tutankh-amen, King, 53, 137.
 Two queens, the arrangement of dual queenship, 203.
 Ty, Queen, 53, 138, 139.
 Uaay, Princess, 103.
 Uasaikon I., 190, 193, 194.
 Uasaikon II., 190, 195, 198, 199.
 Uasarkon III., 200, 201, 206.
 Uasarkon, High Priest, 194.
 Uazet, Queen, 42.
 Uazmes, Chapel of, 77.
 Uazmes, Prince, 48, 53, 71, 77.
 Ugaiet, 128.
 Uni, 18.
 University College, London, 188.
 Unplaced Queens, list of, 230.
 Unuamen, an official, 174.
 Useitsen II., 27, 28, 29.
 Useitsen III., 30.
 Ushabt Figures, 177, 181, 184, ---, 189, 196, 198, 230.
 shanahoru, Prince, 212
 Vassali, M., 185.
 Vatican Collection, the, 145, 146, 150.
 Vanna, 36.
 Wady Gasus, 219, 222.
 Wady Hammamet, 24.
 Wady Maghara, 17.
 Wady Sabua, 147.
 Wand, magical, 33, 76.
 White Crown, the, 41.
 White Queen, the, 156, 157.
 Wiedemann, Herr, 97, 108, 172, 210.
 Wilbour, M., 64.
 Wilkinson, Mr., 99.
 Woman in Egypt, Position of, 2.
 Xoix, 202.
 Za-n, Queen, 37.
 Zalu (or Zaru), 112.
 Zaru, 112.
 Zaunefer, Prince, 187, 188.
 Zer, King, 8, 9.

• • • • •